THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 10, 1860.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The proceedings which Mr. T. B. Saunders, Equity Draftsman and Conveyancer of London, and Magistrate for the County of Wilts, has instituted at Road, in relation to the late mysterious murder in that locality, seems to have little other practical effect than the demonstration in the face of the whole country of the incompleteness of our present system for the detection of crime. It has been well remarked that the inquiries into the Road murder "have gradually assumed so singular a complexion that they are now almost as unexampled in character as the crime itself." Resort has been had but without success to the aid of the coroner—that most ancient and constitutional officer. The more modern, and as the phrase goes, less English, appliances of detective police were next brought into play, with an equal want of result. Next comes the very questionable, private and peculiar investigation conducted by Mr. Slack, a solicitor of Bath, on the authority, however, of the Attorney-General, the issue of which was altogether unfortunate, but by no means owing as it appeared to any want of ability or industry on the part of the gentleman conducting it. And, lastly, comes the public but still more peculiar inquisition of Mr. Saunders—one altogether so anomalous that we refrain from attempting to characterize it. Indeed, it would have been altogether intolerable and would deserve nothing but reprobation, if the public mind was not thoroughly alive to the said defects of our present machinery for bringing criminals to justice. It is a remarkable fact, and one that cannot be too often mentioned by the press of this country, that England is the only civilized country in the world which has no public prosecutor. Considerable discussion has arisen of late between the relative advantages of coroners' inquests and private investigations by officers of the crown, in capital cases. We are so attached in England to old institutions, it is not likely that any one now living will ever see the abolition of the office of coroner, notwithstanding its very partial utility; but a little more experience such as we have had during the last year, will, no doubt, prepare the minds of Englishmen for an addition to the institutions of the country in the shape of a public prosecutor. Such experience as we have recently had, however, shows how utterly inefficient crown counsel would be as prosecutors, without crown solicitors holding appointments in their respective districts—with the duty of instituting on the spot immediate inquiry, and preparing for trial, or, as they say in Scotland, taking the precognitions of witnesses; which, in important cases, might always be at once submitted to the opinion of the Attorney-General. Such a system would not only tend to put a stop to the present immunity of great crimes, as in the case of the Road murder, but would also prevent the possibility of innocent persons being lightly accused of enormous and atrocious crimes.

Mr. Bannatyne, the Dean of the Faculty of Procurators, in Glasgow, has recently delivered to the members of the faculty an address which has been published, and is worthy the attentive perusal of members of the profession south of the Tweed. In it he reviews at some length the alterations which have been made by the recent statute in the educational requirements and preliminary tests of admission into the ranks of attorneys in England. It is gratifying to observe that the tendency of these improvements towards raising the reputation of the general body of English solicitors, not only at home, but in other countries, is so manifest. Mr. Bannatyne strongly urges upon his Scotch brethren the example of the Incorporated Law Society; and calls upon them to substitute effective examinations for mere certificates of attendance on classes, and to extend their curriculum beyond purely legal subjects, so as to ensure, as far as possible, something like collegiate training for their younger members. He proposes, first, that the faculty should postpone for two years the commencement of apprenticeship under the charter, so that no one should be admitted an apprentice until he had attained the age of seventeen years; secondly, the establishment of a higher standard of education, both for apprentices, and for admission; thirdly, the ascertainment of his educational qualification by bonâ fide examinations; and he particularly insists that these examinations should take place not merely at the commencement of the apprenticeship, or upon admission into the profession, but periodically. The Incorporated Law Society of England, after long effort, has succeeded in obtaining parliamentary sanction for the institution of a preliminary test of the competency of persons proposing to become articled clerks; we hope it will now turn its attention to the subject of term or other periodical examinations so as to complete the important work which it has so efficiently commenced.

The following resolution was passed at the Glasgow meeting of the Social Science Conference by the section specially devoted to the subject of general average:—

That the meeting hereby requests the council of the association to assist by their counsels such person or persons as may be approved of by them, in drawing up a Bill, with a view to its being enacted into a law by the legislative authorities of the several nations of the world, which Bill shall define, as clearly as may be, the term "General Average," and describe more or less fully the cases intended to be included within the definition, and which shall also specify the nature of the loss, damage, or expense allowable in general average, and the principle on which the amount of the loss, damage, or expense shall be ascertained; also furnish a rule or rules for ascertaining the contributory values of the interests concerned, and which shall also contain such matters as the person or persons drawing up the Bill may think it advisable to insert: that upon such Bill being drawn up and printed, copies thereof shall be transmitted to the several chambers of commerce, boards of underwriters, shipowners' associations, and other commercial societies in different parts of the world, accompanied by a copy of this resolution, and a request to them to examine and return the said copies, with such alterations or amendments as they may think proper to make therein, within six months from the time of the receipt thereof: that, upon the return of the said copies, or upon the expiration of the said six months, the said Bill shall be revised by the person or persons drawing up the same, enlightened by the information acquired as aforesaid: that upon the Bill being perfected in the manner aforesaid it be recommended to the legislative authorities of all commercial nations, to enact the same into a law.

We believe that this resolution is now under the consideration of the council of the Association, and that it is likely to be carried into effect without delay.

Some applications have already been made to the Lord Chancellor, under the Chancery Amendment Act of last session, for the liberation of Chancery prisoners. The course of proceeding under the Act is extremely simple and inexpensive. In a short time, no doubt, a Chancery prisoner of long standing will have become a thing of the past.

The Lord Chancellor very nearly met with a serious accident on his arrival in his carriage, at Lincoln's-inn, yesterday morning, where he is in the habit of sitting to hear appeals. His Lordship proceeded in his carriage, accompanied by one of his daughters, and had arrived almost at the entrance to his Court, when one of the horses came violently in contact with a cab, throwing the Lord Chancellor and his daughter out of their seats into the front of the carriage. Fortunately, however, neither were injured, although the concussion was sharp and sudden. The horse was severely wounded, and the event caused no little commotion in the usually serene region of Old Square.

Several members of the Inns of Court Rifle Corps have been engaged during the week in contesting for a prize that has been offered by Mr. S. Warren, Q.C., Master in Lunacy. The prize we are informed is a Whitworth rifle. We are not aware whether the winner has yet been declared.

Parliament was on Tuesday further prorogued until the 3rd of January, but it was not stated that the two Houses are to meet on that date "for the dispatch of business."

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL AND THE PROFESSION.

At the beginning of a new volume it may be useful shortly to consider what are the objects of this Journal, and what are the means by which we endeavour to attain them. It has been always one of our chief cares to promote in every way the improvement of the education of the young solicitor, feeling that by this means the profession to which he joins himself will gain from year to year in social position and in influence; so that its services will be better appreciated, and its claims treated with more consideration than they were in times when a respectable professional journal did not exist, and professional organization was almost unknown. It was our conviction at the outset of our labours that society would do justice to the solicitor if only he did justice to himself—if he considered his high position, and his arduous and varied responsibilities, and prepared himself and those who should succeed him in his sphere of duty by the best and most comprehensive education both in legal science and in the knowledge and accomplishments of an English gentleman.

Having in view this ultimate result we should above all things desire that the professional education of the solicitor should not commence at a very early age. We are convinced that the whole body would be benefited by the introduction into it of a greater proportion of members who had gone through the ordinary course of a liberal education at a university. We should wish solicitors to imitate a practice which prevails to a great extent with barristers, and from which the bar collectively derives character and influence. Still we are sensible that the number of graduates who place themselves under articles, although it may from year to year increase, must always continue small. The great majority of the profession will always be compelled to prepare themselves to earn a livelihood at an earlier age than is consistent with the carrying out of that wide and deep plan of education which may be accessible to the select few. But we would earnestly deprecate the placing of mere boys in a solicitor's office, in order that they may have passed through the appointed course of preparation, and may claim admission as practitioners on the very day they attain twenty-one years of age. If a lad is articled at sixteen he will absolutely waste two years which might have been spent to profit at some school or college. It is true that by good abilities and industry such a lad may make himself a sound lawyer and a skilful man of business, but his knowledge of law will be confined within the region of narrow technicalities, and the general power of his mind will be stunted for want of a wider field of exercise. Both within the circle of his professional labours and beyond it, he will find—except in some rare instances which are common to both branches of the profession—throughout even the longest and most successful life, that there is one thing wanting which he might have secured for himself in early life, but in his later and perhaps not unprosperous years, neither industry nor mental vigour can easily supply. If such a man had sons whom he destined to his own profession we are certain that he would feel convinced by his own mature experience of the soundness of our views upon the subject of the education of solicitors.

And if we have desired to see the solicitor come to his labours well prepared, we have also sought to secure for him a fair field where he might labour to the best advantage; and while serving the community effectually might be protected in his own just rights. With this object we have watched and recorded the transactions of the societies whose function it is to promote judicious law reforms, and to deprecate, and if possible to arrest, hasty and ill-considered innovations. On all occasions when changes of law and practice have been proposed, we have exhorted the profession to consider, first, that the interest of all its members, both in town and country, was one and indivisible; and, secondly, that this same single interest would be found in the long run to be identical with that of the whole community. If any project of law reform, from whatever quarter, be tried candidly and deliberately by the test of its general public value, the conclusion thus obtained may be acted on fearlessly and unreservedly; and the end which we have proposed in our discussions has been to attain, if possible, to such conclusions. We believe that in Parliament it begins at last to be understood that the conduct of the Law Societies, in reference to proposed legislative changes, is guided by a sincere desire to promote the simplicity of the law, and to ensure the efficiency of its administration. That such has been, as it ought to be, the object of professional organization appeared from the report in our own columns of the proceedings of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association lately held at Newcastle. In reviewing the history of the legislation of the present year the Chairman showed that the efforts of the Association had been so directed as to gain from Parliament a respectful hearing for the collective experience of solicitors on matters which they must necessarily understand far better than any other class of men. Approaching the consideration of every proposed law reform from a public point of view, the Association is entitled in return to claim from Parliament that the same proposals should be looked at also from the peculiar point of view of the solicitor. Those who have prepared themselves by a costly education for the exercise of a laborious profession are entitled to demand that what are called—sometimes very wrongly—law reforms should not be employed as instruments to impoverish and degrade the lawyers. By the exertions of the Law Societies professional rights and privileges are maintained, and the corporate character of a high and responsible profession is kept constantly before its members' minds, so that none are suffered to forget the duties which they owe to their own body, and to that larger society wherein it forms a conspicuous and influential part. We have now observed for several years the operations of the Incorporated Law Society, of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and of the other similar organizations which exist in large towns and counties. It has been our duty as well as our privilege to report and comment on those operations; and we rejoice to say that they have resulted in equally and largely benefiting at once the client and the solicitor.

It is the business of a professional journal to endeavour to raise the character and social position, to assert the claims, and watch over the interests, of the profession. But another and equally important duty is to assist the practitioner in the daily exercise of his vocation, by promptly noticing, and briefly and clearly explaining, the new statutes and decisions of the courts by which his practice must be regulated, and by endeavouring to furnish him with sound and unbiassed judgments as to the merits of some, at least, of the many legal publications which offer to supply him with fuller and more detailed knowledge than can be conveyed in the columns of a newspaper. In our discharge of this duty, we have endeavoured to make some stand against that prevailing error of the time that the value of every sort of publication is in direct proportion to its length. We have always been sensible that if our readers tried us by the mere number of the words they read, we should be found wanting. We have rather sought to attain, if possible, the praise of judicious selection and condensation. The enormous masses of printed matter which are placed upon the lawyer's table would become an intolerable evil, but for the happy circumstance that he cannot be compelled to read them. Still, if possible, this evil should be resisted by steady adherence to the rule of only noticing what is really new and valuable, and by compressing the notice, whenever possible, in some moderate quantity of words. It has not been, and will not be, our habit to place before our readers heavy masses of undigested verbiage, but to supply to busy men in the shortest compass the practical assistance they require. But while we endeavour to aid the solicitor in his daily routine of duty we would also invite him to look occasionally beyond it. When we say that every lawyer ought to know something of the general science of law and of those great leading principles which underlie all codes and systems of procedure, we are but coming back to the ground from which we first started, and are repeating over again our exhortation to the solicitor to secure for himself, and to those who may follow in his steps, a liberal and comprehensive education. As solicitors gradually learn to feel a deeper interest in the jurisprudence of other times and countries, and in the curious and difficult legal questions which sometimes occupy our own courts, the objects which this Journal has proposed to itself will be to a great extent attained; and we flatter ourselves that it will, at the same time, be seen to have deserved the name it bears.

We have hitherto refrained from noticing the mendacious statements of a legal contemporary, which, from motives of obvious self-interest, industriously seeks to propagate the notion that this journal is the organ and advocate of metropolitan interests, as against those of the country. The fact that we have the warm support of a large number of the foremost men in the profession in the provinces, enables us to pass over such persistent misrepresentations with the contempt which they deserve. Perhaps, we ought to be gratified rather than otherwise at the exhibition of an uneasiness which is, after all, but an unquestionable proof and measure of success.

PROTECTION FROM ARREST.

It may not yet be generally known that during the few remaining days of the last session, after the withdrawal of the Bankruptcy Bill, a short Act, consisting of two sections only, was hurried through Parliament to extend the effect of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 70. The original Act was passed for the purpose professedly of facilitating arrangements between debtors and creditors; but was familiarly designated by practitioners as "the Gentleman's Act," from the facilities it afforded to persons of sensitive feelings to get rid of their debts without incurring those unpleasant consequences of indebtedness, at the expense of which the discharge is usually purchased, namely, the loss of liberty and property and the publication of the state of their affairs.

This Act enables an insolvent, with the concurrence of one third in number and value of his creditors (testified by their signing his petition), to present a petition to the Court of Bankruptcy, setting forth the particulars of his debts and estate; that he is unable to meet his engagements; and also setting forth such proposal as he is able to make for the future payment or compromise of them, to which one-third in number and value of his creditors have assented. Upon the presentation of the petition one of the commissioners is to examine privately into the matter of it; and for that purpose has power to examine upon oath the petitioning debtor and any creditor concurring in his petition, and any witness produced by the petitioning debtor. Upon this examination of the petition the Court may grant to the debtor a temporary protection from arrest until the further proceedings taken upon the petition, and may, if it think fit, require the petitioner to give bail for his future appearance. The Act strictly applies in its terms only to debtors not in custody at the time of petitioning; and the Amending Act of the last session, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 147, is passed to extend the same powers and privileges to debtors in actual custody.

We conceive that several objections may be made on principle to the extraordinary facilities for obtaining protection given by the provisions of the original Act above referred to, as causing a very unfair and vexatious interference with the regular proceedings of creditors; and that these objections apply with additional force to the extended scope given by the amending Act so hurriedly introduced. It will be observed that the petitioner obtains his protection upon examination of his petition merely. He gives up no property; he need not even, unless the Court requires it, give bail for his future appearance. It is true, he must obtain the signatures of one-third in value of his creditors to his petition; but this is a small proportion, and might, we apprehend, in most cases be supplied from amongst the petitioner's immediate circle of relations and connections; for a party in difficulties generally exhausts his nearest friends before borrowing of strangers. The examination is private; and creditors who do not concur in the petition are not summoned, nor can they be examined upon oath. The insolvent is set at liberty and made a gentleman at large, with full command over his person and his estate; and it is plain that if he is inclined to any preferential dealing towards particular creditors, or to evade his liabilities altogether, the Act gives him great facilities for so doing.

The subsequent proceedings under the Act provide for summoning all the creditors to meetings to discuss the proposed arrangement of the insolvent, which may be made ultimately binding on the petitioner and all the creditors who have received due notice of the meetings, provided three-fifths in number and value of the creditors or nine-tenths in value or nine-tenths in number where debts exceed twenty pounds shall consent; and thereupon, but not before, all the estate of the petitioning debtor vests in the trustee appointed by the creditors for that purpose. With the ultimate result of the Act we find no ground for exception. The estate of the insolvent in justice belongs to the creditors; and the law affirms their title subject to the reasonable condition of a sufficient majority coming to such an agreement for its realization as they may think proper.

Far different are the provisions of the General Protection Acts applicable to petitions on the part of the insolvent alone unassisted by any of his friendly creditors. Upon the presentation of the petition all the estate and effects of the petitioner forthwith vest in the official assignee, and notice must be given to all the creditors who have the opportunity to oppose the order for protection. The consent of only one-third of the creditors to a proposed arrangement seems a very inadequate ground for placing the insolvent on such a different footing. The smallness of the body of creditors where consent is required gives, it must be feared, a great opportunity for collusion and fraud. The consequences of the Act will probably be often injurious to non-concurring or hostile creditors who are deprived of their rights without any means of opposing and without any equivalent. A creditor may have embarked in costly proceedings against the insolvent which may at the last moment be rendered fruitless by the ex parte and private proceedings of his debtor. By the Act recently passed the creditor who has actually got his debtor in custody may be thus deprived of the benefit of all his costs and trouble expended in securing him. We believe that the universal principle on which debtors have been released from arrest is that at least a complete distribution of all their property should be substituted; but the Acts in question suspend the right of the creditor without rendering him any compensation in return.

Arrest and imprisonment for debt are still the law of the land. The expediency of retaining them is one of the most important questions of the day; but we must reserve further notice of it to a future occasion, our present object being restricted to pointing out the inconsistency, inconvenience, and injustice of retaining them as law, and yet taking every opportunity of getting rid of their effects. The creditor is thus placed without any fault on his part in a position of the greatest embarrassment. He has a right of arresting his debtor to enforce payment; while his debtor has a nearly equal right of protection or discharge from arrest. He fancies that he possesses a powerful instrument of compulsion; but he finds, on attempting to use it, that it recoils on his own head. The pretended right of the creditor is made a mere snare and a delusion; the law offering him a remedy with one hand, which it suddenly snatches away with the other. We had hoped that the legislature had at length determined to treat the law of bankruptcy and insolvency in one grand and complete scheme, and cease from further attempts to patch up the old system, consisting as it does of a mass of statutes the deficiencies of which are confessedly manifest at every point. We venture to surmise, however, that the legislature must arrive at some definite and final intention with respect to the law of arrest, as one of the essential preliminaries of a permanent settlement of the law of bankruptcy and insolvency. Palliative measures of the nature of the Acts above referred to have an unfortunate tendency to perpetuate the cause of the evil, by abating some of its most obnoxious effects, and so obscuring its true character.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, and Justices WIGHTMAN, HILL, and BLACKBURN.)

Nov. 3.—Ex parte Watson.—The Solicitor-General moved that an attorney and solicitor of the Court of the County Palatine of Durham might be admitted an attorney of this court, on payment of the duty, without giving a term's notice. The application was made under the provisions of a statute of the last session (the 23rd & 24th Victoria, cap. 127). The learned Solicitor-General referred to the 45th section of the 6th & 7th Victoria, cap. 73, and the case of Ex parte Patrick, (13 L. J., Q. B., 90), which he said decided the question.

Mr. Garth, who appeared for the Incorporated Law Society, said, the term's notice was not required by statute, but by a rule of Court; and he submitted that the notice should still be given.

The Court, however, thought otherwise, and granted the application.

In re —, an attorney.—Mr. Turner moved, on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, that an attorney should be struck off the rolls for misconduct in applying the money of his client to his own use. The attorney pretended that he had advanced a sum of £100 to a person named Truman at 5 per cent interest. The interest was paid for some time, but it came to the client's ears that the attorney was in bad circumstances, and this induced her to require him to give up her securities. Not obtaining what she demanded, she required him to state who the man Truman was, upon which he stated that he himself was the man Truman, that he had no securities, but he would endeavour to procure security.

The Court granted a rule to show cause.

Nov. 6.—In the matter of Lieutenant Allen.—Mr. J. Brown moved for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the governor of the Queen's Prison, commanding him to bring up the body of William Henry Craven Allen, a lieutenant in the 82d Foot, in order to his discharge, upon the ground that he was detained in illegal custody there, under the sentence of a court-martial. The learned counsel stated that his affidavits were entitled "In the Matter of W. H. C. Allen."

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, after referring to Master Corner, said the words were surplusage; it was sufficient if the affidavits had the correct title of the court.

Mr. Brown then proceeded to state that Lieutenant Allen was a young man, twenty years of age, who was tried by a court martial on the 28th of February, 1859 at Shalychanpore, in the East Indies, for the murder of one Bidasse, his servant. The court-martial found him guilty of manslaughter only, and sentenced him to be imprisoned four years, without hard labour. The sentence was confirmed by the Commander-in-Chief, and Agra fort appointed to be the place of his imprisonment. The Horse Guards, it appeared, had turned that sentence into one of transportation, and had brought him over to this country and subjected him to penal servitude, of which he now complained.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN asked whether he understood correctly that a sentence of imprisonment, without hard labour, had been converted into one of penal servitude?

Mr. Brown said that was the case.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN.—Take a rule to show cause.

Mr. Brown said the rule would be on the keeper of the Queen's Prison.

Mr. Justice HILL said it should also be served on the Home-office and Secretary for War.

Rule nisi granted.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Before the LORD CHIEF BARON, MR. BARON BRAMWELL, MR. BARON CHANNELL, and MR. BARON WILDE.)

Nov. 3.—Fidley v. Oxlade.—Proceedings were commenced upon a bill of exchange under the provisions of the 18th & 19th of Victoria. The twelfth day falling on a Sunday, judgment was signed on the day previous. An application was made to

Mr. Justice Keating, at chambers, to set aside the judgment on the ground that it had been signed one day too soon. The application proving successful, the plaintiff, an attorney, commenced the present action against the defendant for his costs. The case was sent down by writ of trial to be heard before the Under-Sheriff of Middlesex. The defence was that the plaintiff had been guilty of negligence in signing the judgment a day before the proper time for so doing.

Mr. Patchett now moved for a rule for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the Under-Sheriff having told the jury that there was a decision given by Mr. Justice Erle at chambers (Lewis v. Calor, 1 Foster & Finlason, 306), by which he felt himself bound to the effect that Sunday should not be included in the twelve days allowed by the Act before signing judgment. Mr. Patchett urged that it was the duty of the attorney to sign judgment at the earliest possible moment, and that in this case there was neither negligence in law nor negligence in fact.

The LORD CHIEF BARON.—If the earliest possible moment involved a doubt, then the safer and better course would be to steer clear of the doubt.

Mr. Patchett.—The statute prescribes a time in which judgment is to be or may be signed, and no rule of Court can override the statute; it was a misdirection in telling the jury that judgment was signed too soon.

Their LORDSHIPS granted a rule to show cause.

The Queen has been pleased to confer the honour of knighthood upon Charles Sargent, Esq., Chief Justice of the Ionian Islands.

Mr. Albert W. Beetham, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed to the Recordership of Dartmouth, in the room of Mr. T. W. Saunders, who has been appointed Recorder of Bath.

Mr. William BurrIDGE Richardson, of No. 28, Queen-street, Cheap-side, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the cities of London and Westminster, and for the county of Middlesex.

Mr. George Ridley, of the northern circuit, and M.P. for Newcastle-on-Tyne, has been appointed one of the Copyhold Enclosure Commissioners, in the room of Mr. Blamire, resigned. A vacancy in the representation of Newcastle will thus be created.

Mr. R. Earle Welby, of the Treasury, late Secretary to Mr. Laing, will continue to act in the same capacity with the Right Hon. F. Peel, who has been appointed Joint Secretary to the Treasury.

The Lord Chief Justice Cockburn has appointed Mr. James Hemp, Deputy Clerk of Assize on the Oxford Circuit, and one of the clerks of arraigns at the Central Criminal Court, to the clerkship of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, vacated by the death of Mr. Straight.

COMMON LAW.

[By JAMES STEPHEN, Esq., D.C.L., Barrister-at-Law.]

ACTIONS AGAINST CARRIERS, COSTS IN.

Tatton v. The Great Western Railway Company, 8 W. R., Q. B., 606.

Several cases have established that actions against carriers for the non-delivery of goods are based on the wrong committed by the breach of that common law duty, safely to carry and deliver, which is incident to the office of carrier; and are not grounded on any individual contract entered into by the carrier with the consignor or consignee of the goods. In other words, such actions are ex delicto not ex contractu, and from this fact important consequences arise. Thus the non-joinder of a party jointly liable as defendant, cannot be objected to by plea in abatement or otherwise (see Pozzi v. Shipton, 8 A. & E. 963). And it appears even to be immaterial with regard to this, that the declaration may show that there was a special contract between the parties in respect of the same transaction; though if such special contract contained terms which would not be implied merely by the relationship of bailor and carrier, then the action may be well brought on such special contract, and in that case would be changed in its character, becoming one of contract (see Legge v. Tucker, 1 H. & N. 503). The present case shows another important result of the true nature of the ordinary action against a common carrier. This is, that the action is not within that provision of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108 (sect. 30), which deprives a plaintiff in an action "of contract," brought to recover a sum not exceeding £20, where the defendant suffers judgment by default; It is, on the other hand, within the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 11 (being an action "on the case," that is a variety of the general division of actions on torts), and consequently the plaintiff is entitled to his costs on the defendant suffering judgment by default, although a less sum than £20 be recovered.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—SIGNED BILL—AGREEMENT TO RECEIVE FIXED SUM FOR SERVICES.

Philley v. Hayle, 8 W. R., C. P., 611.

The declaration in this action was for a certain sum alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff on the money counts; and as a defence it was pleaded that the money claimed was due, if at all, to the plaintiff as the defendant's attorney, and that no signed bill had been delivered a month before action, as required by the statute.

It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff sought to recover under an agreement into which he had entered with the defendant to endeavour to obtain for him at the sessions a spirit licence, on the terms of receiving (if he succeeded) his costs out of pocket, and a certain fixed sum in addition; if he did not succeed, his costs out of pocket only. A bill was delivered before action, but it gave the items only of the sums paid out of pocket by the plaintiff.

The Court of Common Pleas unanimously held this transaction to be illegal, and consequently that the plaintiff could not recover. They said that the policy of the Legislature appeared to prohibit all agreements with clients which would have the effect of giving the attorney more than he would obtain on taxation, though an agreement under which he would receive less would be good enough. "The client," said Mr. Justice Willes, "is entitled to have the judgment of the Master upon the propriety of the charges."

These remarks by the Court of Common Pleas are substantially consistent with previous decisions on this subject; although in one case in the Rolls, an agreement by a solicitor to take a gross sum from his client in lieu of costs was held not to be void, though highly inexpedient (Re Whitcombe, 8 Beav. 140).

TROVER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Chinery v. Viall, 8 W. R., Exch., 629.

This case is an instructive one, and from it two general principles may be deduced. First, in order to maintain "trover," it is not necessary that the plaintiff should have had the possession of the goods when converted, provided the property in them had passed to him. Thus, in the present case, A. had sold sheep to B. upon credit, and before the time of payment arrived and while they remained in A.'s possession, he re-sold and delivered them to C. Here A. was held to have converted the sheep, just as though, being a pledgee, he had disposed of the pledge. For, said the Court, A., under these circumstances, (there having been no default on the part of the vendee) retained possession of the sheep, not quid vendor, but as the agent and for the benefit of B.

2ndly. In case of a conversion of goods, no arbitrary and absolute rule can be laid down with regard to the measure of damages. In many cases no more than the real damage, that is the loss actually sustained, can be recovered (see Lamond v. Davall, 9 Q. B. 1030; and Read v. Fairbanks, 13 C. B. 692); although in cases of wilful tort and not for a bare conversion it may be otherwise. The principle to be deduced from the authorities on this subject, is that a plaintiff cannot by suing in trover, instead of in case or other form of action, vary the amount of damage so as to recover more than he is really in law entitled to, according to the true facts of the case and the real nature of the transaction. Hence, in the particular case now under consideration, B. was not held to be entitled to recover from A. the value of the sheep when re-sold to C.; but only such value minus the price B. would have had to pay A. on paying for the sheep he had purchased from him.

STATISTICS OF OUR CIVIL COURTS.

The second part of the Judicial Statistics for the year 1859 comprises the returns from all courts exercising a civil jurisdiction. The proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench on the Crown side are likewise enumerated, and were as follows:—

On Writs of Mandamus—Applications on Affidavit ...	59
On Quo Warranto—Informations filed	7
On Writs of Habeas Corpus—Applications for Writs .	34
On Writs of Certiorari—Writs issued	99
Judgments and Executions	12
On Grand Jury Bills	1
On Informations ex officio	1
On Orders of Sessions—Removed into Queen's Bench	25
On Special Cases from Quarter Sessions (12 & 13
On Special Cases on Proceedings before Justices (20
& 21 Vict. c. 43).....	61

The returns of proceedings in the three courts on the Plea side are as follows:—

These returns indicate the continuance of a predilection for the Court of Exchequer; although the causes, viz., a diversity of scales of taxation and fees in the different courts, which originally gained the Court of Exchequer favour with the profession, have ceased to exist. This anomaly shows that the abolition of old rules by no means induces immediately a proportionate result. The vis viva and vis inertia continue to operate long after the extinction of the causes from which they sprang. The possibility of an inconveniently unequal distribution of business in the Irish Courts was guarded against by the Irish Common Law Procedure Act, which directs that the writs should be filed uniformly, according to a certain rotation, in the three courts. The same remedy is open to us if the pressure of business in the Exchequer ever becomes inconvenient. The inequality, however, must finally disappear of its own accord, its cause having ceased to exist. Yet it teaches us that the effects of legal improvements should be estimated with caution, and that time should be readily allowed them to yield their natural fruit. If changes in the law recommend themselves to our understanding, we may rest assured that the realization of their utility is a question of time, and not of intrinsic probability. On the other hand, this preponderance of business in the Exchequer shows that customs and prejudices cannot be disregarded, but must be estimated as facts in all our calculations, and allowances made for them accordingly. Thus, by not tempting the open sea of change, nor by cruising always along a shallow beach, we shall best temper the necessary reforms with a prudent moderation.

The number of suits commenced in the year was less by 16·5 per cent. than the corresponding return for 1858. The following table of causes entered for trial includes among the causes for trial on circuit, 33 suits entered in the Common Pleas of Lancaster, 4 entered in the Court of Pleas of Durham, and 2 issues from the Court of Probate.

As to the nature of the suits, the numbers of a few species only need be stated, the rest being of the more usual character of suits. For compensation for personal injuries under Lord Campbell's Act, the number of suits was 19; for compensation for other injuries, 71; for infringement of patents, 19; for breach of promise of marriage, 22; for libel, 45; for slander, 60; for malicious prosecution, 7; false imprisonment, 72; indictments, 15; and against sheriffs, 5. The number of suits tried on the circuits was, on the Home Circuit, 277; Midland, 120; Norfolk, 49; Oxford, 143; Northern, 132; Western, 135; South Wales, 33; North Wales, 35; Lancashire Common Pleas, 265; Durham Common Pleas, 30. The judgments were as follows:—

It is remarkable, that of the immense business of this great commercial nation, so small a proportion gives rise to litigation, and that even in the past year, notwithstanding a probably larger amount of commercial transactions, there has been less litigation in the superior civil courts than occurred in 1858.

It is also curious to observe the proportion of litigated cases abandoned by defendants. The proportion of undefended actions was 72·7 per cent.; of the actions defended only 13·5 per cent. were entered for trial: and of the total of the suits commenced, only 2·2 in the 100 were actually tried; and even of these, many, as the report states, were undefended at the hearing. The business is, perhaps, more equally distributed among the circuits than is generally considered. It appears, also, that the Northern is not, as is commonly supposed, the most favoured in this respect. This approximately equal distribution of business among the circuits is a great public benefit, as it tends to an equal diffusion of forensic talent.

The following statement of the results of the cases comprises all tried at Nisi Prius, including those tried in the Common Pleas Courts of Lancaster and Durham.

	Total.	Queen's Bench.	Common Pleas.	Exchequer.	Nisi Prius.

The proportion of the writs of summons issued was in the Queen's Bench 32·3 per cent., in the Common Pleas, 24·8 per cent., and in the Exchequer, 42·9 per cent. The averages in the different courts tend to an equality, as to trials; the proportion of causes tried being for the Queen's Bench 33·5 per cent., Common Pleas, 30·4 per cent., and Exchequer, 36·1 per cent. The diversity of the averages, however, again, of course, appears on the judgments, the proportion of those being for the Queen's Bench 33·6 per cent.; Common Pleas, 21·8 per cent., and Exchequer, 44·6 per cent. Verdicts were obtained for amounts above £5,000 in 11 cases; for £20 and under the number was 341. The total amount recovered was £324,388. The total of writs of fiore facias was 14,052; of capias ad satisfaciendum, 8,142; of possession, 583; of elegit, 42; of exegi facias, 53; of capias utlagatum, 6; total of writs of execution, 22,878. The plaintiff thus, it appears, succeeds in more than three-fourths of the actions. This, alone, indicates the non-litigious character of the nation, as it shows that the moving party had, as a general rule, just cause for the suit. If ever international statistics be generally accessible, it will be an interesting study to consider the comparative advance in public morals in different nations, as recorded not only by the number of suits commenced, but also in the number of suits abandoned or perversely litigated. This success of the plaintiff should not, of course, induce any future plaintiff, who may be acquainted with the statistics, to conclude that the chances, like the average, are more than 4 to 1 in his favour. Such an inference would be wholly unwarranted. Statistics are only applicable to general laws, and are useful mainly to the legislator. If an individual could lawfully become the assignee of causes of action, and then litigate by wholesale, general averages might be used by him to estimate the probable profits of his unlimited liability. But, that an individual litigant should calculate his chances of success from judicial statistics would be as rational, as that a patient should estimate the likelihood of his recovery by a comparison of his age with the average duration of human life. Of new trial motions, 103 were refused; in 225 such motions, rules nisi were granted; in 96, the rules were made absolute; and in 104, the rules were discharged. Of the 86,270 suits commenced, only 23,762 were cases in which defences were filed; of these, only 3,209 were entered for trial; and of these, only 1,939 were actually tried; so that, as is stated in the report, of the suits commenced, only 2·2 per cent. remained for the decision of a jury. Judgments were also obtained in 31,318 of the cases not so tried, thus forming a proportion of 38·8 to every 100 cases entered. In 22,378 cases, writs of execution were issued in the proportion of 61·4 per cent. against the goods, and 35·5 per cent. against the person of the defendant. As to the proceedings in chambers, the total number of summonses was 41,315. There was but 1 writ of error; and 2 bills of exceptions. Of the proceedings in the Court of Error the number of notices and writs of error was 34; set down for argument, 32; writs affirmed, 11; writs reversed, 2; remanets, 5. Of appeals from the Court in Banco there were notices of appeal lodged, 44; set down for argument, 20; affirmed, 14; reversed, 4; remanets, 5. The amount of the Sutors' Fund was, on the 1st of January, 1859, £38,659 18s. 7d., to which was added during the year, £110,650 2s. 7d.; the total to the 1st of January, 1860, thus being £149,310 1s. 2d. The amount paid out during the year was £112,286 13s. 11d. The fees levied by the Common Law Masters during the year was £58,902 1s. 0d., of which the sum of £38,057 7s. 10d. was disbursed for salaries and other like expenses.

The high proportion which the executions bear to the judgments—like the progressional falling away of defendants at the successive stages of the action—is an index of the non-litigious character of the nation, as it shows that the failure to discharge claims arose from an inability, and not a reluctance, on the part of those who were liable. The high proportion of new trial motions to the trials proves either that the litigious number of our countrymen, however inconsiderable, are very litigious indeed, or that these protracted contests were cases in which the legal rights of the parties were really obscure—an inference more in accordance with the other data, and one which we more willingly suggest.

Correspondence.

EQUITY PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE OLD PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

In proof of the truth of the assertion by a "Solicitor's Clerk" in the Solicitor's Journal of the 15th September last, that "the judges were too much in a hurry to get through business to bestow a moment's time on the form (or he may have added the justice) of the order," permit me to mention the following melancholy facts.

A gentleman of Bristol who died in 1824 worth upwards of £800 a year, by his will, duly signed and attested, gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay the income among his seven children, and the survivor, during their respective lives, and then to divide his property among such of his grandchildren as should be then living.

In 1835 a bill was filed in the Court of Exchequer by a member of the family to have the trusts of the will declared by the Court, which bill Lord Abinger dismissed without allowing costs to any party, on the grounds that the trusts of the will could be carried out without the assistance of the Court. However, subsequent suits in chancery were instituted by some members of the testator's family, and even by other parties who could not by any possibility have any claim to the property; and at the hearing of the cause in 1854, before one of the Vice-Chancellors, he ordered the costs of all the solicitors (thirteen in number), to be paid out of the estate whether their clients had any claim or not (upon which he gave no decision), and to be raised by sale or mortgage of the freehold estates. These costs, amounting to the enormous sum of £7,200 and upwards, were paid out of money raised by a mortgage of the estates, which mortgage was subsequently paid off by a sale of the estates (thus swelling out the costs as much as possible). The sale produced about £11,000, out of which the sum of £2,245 only has been paid into court to the credit of the estate.

The result of the above order has been most disastrous to the testator's surviving son (now upwards of eighty-two), who is the only one of the testator's children who has any children living, and who has not been able to get from the trustees one shilling towards his support for the last two years, and is at this moment dependant on the voluntary contributions of a few benevolent individuals for the maintenance of himself and his two unmarried daughters.

STAMP ACT—PROOF OF CANCELLATION

The 12th section of the New Stamp Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 111, requiring proof of the sixpenny adhesive stamp being cancelled at the time of signing, may, in practice, cause inconvenience. Allow me to suggest, that in order to provide for this the form of attestation should run thus:—

Signed by the said A. B. in my presence, who, at the time of so signing, did write upon or across the stamp his name, and the date of the day, and year of writing the same.

COSTS IN SUPERIOR COURTS.

If an action is commenced and successfully prosecuted in one of the superior courts of law, to recover a debt which is within the jurisdiction of the county court, and the judge at the trial refuses to certify for costs, can the defendant recover from the plaintiff the excess of costs to which he has been put by being compelled to defend the action in a superior court instead of the county court?

If he cannot, what course should he adopt, after service of the writ and appearance entered, in order to stop costs?

A TYRO.

THE COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

I read "D. A.'s" letter of the 25th of August, and the "Attorney's Clerk's" of the 15th of September, and am surprised nothing further has been suggested on this important subject. I conclude everyone is quite sick of the wretched system, and yet none think it worth while to try to remedy it. It seems to me "D. A.'s" suggestions might safely be carried out, and that he strikes at the root of the evil. The confusion and inconvenience that have been caused by the uncertain and often late attendance of a judge only twice a week, is not all the damage which results from the present system.

ANOTHER ATTORNEY'S CLERK.

CHANCERY JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

I commend to the attention of your readers Sir J. Graham's speech of the 20th of August, in your number of the 25th of that month. It entirely follows out the views so often expressed by your correspondents and in your articles as to the objects and working of the Acts, and shews that the defect arises from the chief clerks doing business for which they are obviously unfitted.

X.

THE COMMON LAW MASTERS.

It was lately proposed in your paper that the common law masters should assist the judges in the disposal of minor summonses. I can safely say that they have very little to do. Master Gordon, of the Common Pleas, has been attending during the vacation, but I heard him say that he was not obliged to stop after one o'clock. I think he came about twice a-week.

A COMMON LAW MANAGING CLERK.

MANOR COURTS.

I return to the Judicial Statistics. Will any one believe that there still exist thirty manor, &c., courts at the present day? But see p 134, and the business done in some is really important and extensive. What is the use of county courts? What of the superior Courts? If the wretched minor jurisdictions exposed on this page like kites on a barn door as a warning (for nothing else can be meant) are to exist, I cannot see why they are not to be all over the kingdom, and why the old courts of request are not to be resuscitated. I heard of a curious instance of the power of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford's Court. An undergraduate who had left college had to go there to defend an action. I am told it is a common case—fancy dragging a man from Cornwall to Oxford because he had once been at college! Who knows anything of the Vice-Chancellor's Court at Oxford, and is it to be compared with a court presided over by judges appointed by the Lord Chancellor, and regulated by acts and rules known to all. Did ever any one hear of half the manors having courts? They must be held in pill boxes; and I only account for their existence on the ground that no one is aware of them.

BIRMINGHAM.—Our readers are aware that it is required on the part of the accountants who are entrusted with the preparation of a bankrupt's balance-sheet, that they or their clerks should attend at the office of the official assignee, to obtain access to the books for that purpose; and it is supposed that proper accommodation shall be afforded to them to facilitate their labours. In the case of one of the official assignees of the Birmingham District Court (Mr. Kinnear), however, the personal comfort of the gentlemen engaged in these arduous duties appears to have been overlooked. Frequent complaints having been made to the Commissioner as to the want of accommodation for the preparation of bankrupts' balance-sheets in that gentleman's office, and it having recently been represented to the court, that a clerk to an accountant was lying in a dangerous state from the effects of the dampness of the office, Mr. Registrar Waterfield directed his usher to obtain the report of a surgeon on the condition of the place. A surgeon was accordingly employed, and having gone through the cellars (for they cannot be otherwise designated), fitted up as offices, reported that "they were not fit for human beings to sit in." The Commissioner, upon hearing this statement, immediately made an order for the books of the bankrupt by whom the complaint was made to be given up to him, so that he might prepare his balance-sheet elsewhere, and not injure his health.

At a private meeting of the town council, held on the 2nd inst., a decision was come to in favour of electing Mr. Arthur Ryland mayor for next year, the present mayor having declined to accept office a second time, stating that no such necessity as would have justified his re-election had been made manifest; and that, indeed, there were cogent reasons why, on the contrary, Mr. Ryland should occupy the office. Mr. Ryland was therefore nominated, and after a lengthened discussion, the result was a vote in favour of the election of Mr. Ryland.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—County Court of Wolverhampton: Edwards v. Foster.—This case was argued on the 29th ult. before Mr. Skinner. Mr. Motteram, of the Oxford Circuit, appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Barnett for Mr. Foster. The action was brought to recover the sum of £10 17s. 6d. for goods supplied to the defendant in March last by the plaintiff. A short time since the defendant petitioned the Birmingham Bankruptcy Court under the Private Arrangement Clause, and obtained protection from arrest; but it was contended that the protection so granted could not prevent the plaintiff from obtaining a verdict, inasmuch as it only extended to the security of his person and goods from process, and did not prevent the plaintiff from suing and obtaining judgment, though it would be so if execution issued. If the plaintiff was to be prevented from bringing his action and obtaining a verdict because of the protection, it might act to his injury in case the arrangement should by any means be upset. Mr. Barnett contended that as the plaintiff was scheduled by Mr. Foster, the latter was protected against any proceedings of this nature from him by the protection which he had obtained under the 211th section of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act; and further, that he was bound by the arrangement to which more than the legal three-fifths in number and value of Mr. Foster's other creditors had come. His Honour gave judgment for the plaintiff.

At a meeting of county and borough magistrates and other gentlemen in this town, on the 31st ult., it was resolved that a public subscription should be entered into for the purpose of presenting to John Leigh, Esq., late stipendiary magistrate for South Staffordshire, a token of respect from the inhabitants of South Staffordshire upon his removal to Worship-street Court.

Ireland.

REAL PROPERTY LAW AMENDMENTS OF THE SESSION 1860.

The late session of Parliament, barren as it proved with regard to legal improvements in England, was partly redeemed from a similar stigma in the estimation of Irish lawyers by the passing of two Acts of a practical character relating to land in Ireland. The statutes 23 & 24 Vict. c. 153 and 154 became law, not without much discussion; but, having surmounted all obstacles, mainly through the determination shown by Mr. Cardwell and Serjeant Denny, they at length received the royal assent; and it remains to be seen how far the expectations will be realized of those who have predicted their failure in practice.

The object of the first of these Acts, "The Landed Property Improvement Act," is sufficiently indicated by its title. Hitherto improvements on land have either been neglected altogether, or have been effected through advances of public money under several modern statutes. It was, however, felt that there was money in abundance in private hands applicable for this important purpose, and that the want to be supplied was that of a guarantee that improvements effected on settled estates (and few large estates in Ireland are out of settlement) should be fairly paid for, and that the benefit of expensive works done by one person should not be wholly reaped by another person. Accordingly, this Act enables improvements to be carried out on settled estates with private funds and on equitable terms; and it further contains leasing clauses which promise to supersede the more costly machinery provided by the "Settled Estates Act" of 1856. Then follows the part of the Act relating to "improvements by tenants," a subject most fully discussed in Parliament. The Act in its present shape gives every security that a landlord shall not in any case be charged for improvements made on his estate against his will. As this Act very closely concerns those connected with the landed interest as owners, or mortgagees, it may be well to glance at its chief features as briefly as possible.

A limited owner, that is, a person entitled for the term of his life to the enjoyment of an estate, under any deed or will, is empowered to charge the estate as against the remaindermen with the cost of any of the following improvements—thorough or main drainage of land; reclaiming land from tidal or other waters; embankments; reclamation or inclosure of bog and waste lands; making of roads or fences; erection of farm-buildings, houses for stewards, labourers, &c., and other buildings for farm purposes; and the renewal or reconstruction of any of the foregoing works, or alterations in or additions to them.

The Act proceeds to point out the way in which the improving owner is to proceed. A statement of the intended improvements, containing also all further particulars that can be material, is to be lodged in the Landed Estates Court, a judge of which Court is, after the service of notice on all parties interested, authorised to sanction the proposed improvements. After the works are completed, proof of their completion is to be furnished to the Court, which may then finally make a "charging order" (after another notice to the successor and all persons interested), charging the estate with payment of an annuity of £7 2s. for every £100 shown to have been laid out in such improvements, and payable for twenty-five years to the limited owner or his representatives. This annuity is, unless the judge shall otherwise direct, to have priority over all other charges or incumbrances whatever (excepting Government advances, head rents, &c.) The order charging the annuity is to be registered in the proper office. Regulations are to be made by the Court as to the details of procedure under this part of the Act.

The next division of the Act relates to leases. Limited owners are empowered under certain conditions to grant agricultural leases for twenty-one years, improvement leases for forty years, and building leases for ninety-nine years. Of every such lease a counterpart must be executed by the tenant containing a covenant for payment of rent. Agricultural leases may be granted by the owner of his own accord; but if he desire to grant an improvement lease of longer term, he must obtain the sanction of the county judge of the county where the land is situate. Building or repairing leases must also be sanctioned by the same authority; and where the building lease is of land beyond a certain value or extent, or for a longer term than ninety-nine years, the sanction of a judge of the Landed Estates Court must be obtained on application in a summary way. A new attempt is made by the Act to shorten indentures of leases (notwithstanding the failure of similar attempts in former times). It is declared that in agricultural leases covenants for good husbandry, &c., are to be implied, and the usual condition of re-entry for payment of rent is also to be implied in every description of lease. Every lease including any building is to specify on whom the obligation of rebuilding is to lie, in case of loss by fire, &c. The leases are to take effect in possession, and to reserve the full yearly rent; but in the case of building leases, a nominal rent is allowed to be reserved during the first five years of the term.

The Act points out the description of improvements to be provided for in an improvement lease, and authorizes rules of practice for obtaining the sanction of the Landed Estates Court, or the county court, to be made by the judges of those courts respectively.

The third part of the Act has for its object the encouragement of tenants themselves in making valuable improvements on the land in their occupation. The following are declared to be tenants' improvements—thorough or main drainage; reclamation and enclosure; making farm roads; irrigation; embankment from inland waters; erection of farm houses, or buildings suitable to the farm; reconstruction or renewal of any of the foregoing works. The "limited owner," or tenant for life, however restricted by the terms of his settlement, may contract with a tenant for the carrying out of any of these improvements; and after their completion, the tenant will be entitled to receive an annuity for twenty-five years of £7 2s. for every one hundred pounds so expended by him. A statement of the nature and value of the improvements is to be lodged with the clerk of the peace of the county, and the sanction of the county judge must be obtained. But before making the order charging the lands, the judge must hear any objections that may be raised; and he is authorized to make inquiries through competent persons, and on his being satisfied that the amount has been bona fide expended, he may make the order charging the annuity in favour of the tenant and his representatives, payable for twenty-five years annually from the date of the order. The annuity is to be in suspense so long as the tenant continues in his tenancy, and becomes actually payable only on his being ejected from his tenancy. Where no express agreement is entered into between tenant and landlord, the tenant is enabled to serve a notice on the landlord specifying the improvements he desires to make, with other particulars, and the estimated expense. The landlord may thereupon take either of three courses. He may, by agreement with the tenant, himself execute the works, charging the tenant an extra five per cent. upon the outlay to be recovered as rent. Or he may, within three months, notify to the tenant his unwillingness that the land should be improved; in which case, as no appeal lies, the improvements of course cannot be executed at all. Thirdly, the landlord may remain passive, and permit the tenant to execute the works at his own cost, to be repaid by an annuity as before stated.

Such are the leading features of this Act, which must surely remove any difficulties interposed by the English laws of settlement in the way of land improvement.

We reserve for the present a notice of the second and more lengthy Irish Real Property Act of this session—the Landlord and Tenant Consolidation Act.

In the Court of Exchequer on the 3rd inst., in a cause of Armstrong v. The Earl of Meath. Mr. Whiteside, Q.C., for the plaintiff, applied to the court to allow the case to stand over for a few days. He had received Mr. (now Master) Fitzgibbon's brief, and as the case had been partly argued, he wished to learn from the Master where he left off, so that he (Mr. Whiteside) might take up the case at that point, and thus save the time of the Court.

The CHIEF BARON said that under the circumstances the case might stand over.

Mr. Lawson, Q.C., has been called to the degree of second serjeant-at-law, and Mr. Sullivan, Q.C., to the degree of third serjeant-at-law.

Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald, Q.C., has been appointed one of the Masters of the High Court of Chancery.

COUR IMPERIALE DE BOURGES.

TREASURE-TROVE—PARENTAL LIABILITY.

The discoverer of treasure is entitled to a moiety of it, to the exclusion of others who were present at the time of the finding, and aided the finder in collecting the treasure.

The parent is not liable for the mis-feasance of the child, where he could not have prevented the act complained of, and there is no evidence that the education of the child has been culpably neglected.

The Imperial Court of Bourges has lately made a decision with reference to treasure-trove not without interest. It appears that Jacques Descoux, a youth who was employed in digging the foundation for a new house in Bourges, discovered a treasure buried in the earth, consisting of a hundred and fifty-eight pieces of gold. He called his comrades, and together they collected the gold, and placed it in the hands of Rollin, the master mason, who made a division of the spoil; but Descoux, conceiving that he was wronged, summoned Rollin and the others before the Tribunal of First Instance.

Descoux, the father, in the name and as the guardian of his son, claimed that his son, as the finder of the treasure, was entitled to it, to the exclusion of all the other workmen who were working with him at the time of the discovery; that, notwithstanding, he had been despoiled by the others, who, profiting by his inexperience, had robbed him of the greater part of the treasure, and only allotted to him an inconsiderable portion of the sum found; and concluded by calling upon them to restore the value of half the treasure, with interest and costs. The land in which the treasure was found belonged to the department of Cher, and by law half of it was the property of the department. Accordingly, the Prefect of Cher intervened as representing the department, and demanded the restitution of half the treasure. The judgment of the Court declared the intervention of the prefect receivable and well founded; that Descoux must be considered as the sole discoverer of the treasure; condemned the defendants to recoup; ordered one moiety to be paid to the prefect, and the other moiety to Descoux.

On appeal to the Imperial Court the judgment of the Court below was confirmed as far as concerned the rights of the prefect and the right of the finder; but as regarded the liabilities of the different defendants the judgment was considerably altered. There is one clause of the judgment which we will give in extenso, as showing the different policy of the French law from our own. It seems that one of the defendants was simply charged as the father of one of the workmen, being himself altogether unconnected with the transaction. The language of the Court was as follows:—

"Considering, that the article 1384 of the Code Napoleon does not decide that every fault on the part of a son absolutely involves the responsibility of the father, since the same article enacts that this responsibility ceases if the father proves that he could not prevent the action which occasions it; that in the present case it is true that Gabriel Jean lived with his father, but that he habitually worked in a workshop and under the orders of a master who, up to that time, had enjoyed a good reputation; that it was at the usual hour, and during the time of labour, and under the eyes of his master, and even by his act, that the said Gabriel Jean took the sums the restitution of which is claimed; that it seems, therefore, that Jean the father could not possibly have foreseen and prevented such an act; that neither the correctional information nor the civil proceedings have shown any evidence which tends to incriminate either the morals of the father or the education which he has given to his son; that indeed, it is alleged, without any evidence in support, that the father must have known that the son had money, since he had purchased clothes and utensils, but that the knowledge which he might have had of these purchases could not be of a nature to involve him in the consequences of an accomplished fact, unless he had either concealed or diverted a portion of the product of the quasi delictum, in which case he might be proceeded against as personally bound; that, moreover, and in law, if the father, although absent, may be declared responsible for the acts of his infant son, it can only be, according to the sound interpretation of the law, in cases in which the concomitant and characteristic circumstances of the fault of the son have denoted in him vicious habits which prove the want of domestic discipline; that it is not so in the present instance, in which the faults with which Gabriel Jean has been justly reproached, although punishable by law, do not seem to have appeared with their true gravity and importance to the eyes of a youth of eighteen, as has been acknowledged by the Correctional Tribunal.

"Declares that Jean the father is not responsible for the acts of his son, and discharges him from the claim made against him by the Prefect of Cher and by Descoux."

The Civil Tribunal of Bourges has lately decided that when a station-master of a railroad receives from another station-master a telegraphic despatch to enquire if the road be clear, and answers in the affirmative; whilst it is at the same time blocked up, he commits a fault which makes him responsible in case of accident; and it does not make any difference that he hoped to clear the road before the arrival of the expected train. In the same case the Court held the company liable jointly with the delinquent servant.

M. Charrié, one of the former celebrities of the bar of Bordeaux, is just deceased, at the mature age of seventy-six. His name is not much known amongst the present generation. For the last few years M. Charrié had, to a great extent, retired from the practice of his profession, and devoted himself to his beloved literature. But many years ago, during the palmy days of the First Empire, M. Charrié was distinguished among the brilliant circle of orators who then ornamented the bar of Bordeaux. There was one case in which Charrié at that time distinguished himself—a case which has since been often cited in questions concerning literary property—that of Madame Lesparde, about the writings of Chénier. The last cause he pleaded was that of General Clouet, in 1846, before the Royal Court of Paris. His pleading has been printed, and, if we do not mistake, is included in the collection of the Barreau Moderne. Frequently of late years, since his retirement from the active pursuit of his profession, he might be seen in the Palais, attracted thither by his affection for his brethren, and the love he still felt for a profession which he had practised with so much ability and dignity.

We are indebted to Mr. A. C. Scoles, of Bedford-row, for the following authenticated translation from the Arabic of a recently executed purchase deed, according to the Mohammedan form, of a house and premises in Jerusalem.

"Seal and signature of the Kadij of Jerusalem.

"This is a true and legal title-deed, a precise and accurate document, the purport of which is framed and its contents constructed from the record of what was transacted and recorded in a sitting of the venerable Law Court, may God most High magnify it, before our lord and master, the very learned and truly efficient judge, who writes the accuracies of law and interpretation, and expounds the principles of both in the best manner, the chief of the judges of Islam, the most learned of all doctors; the mullah who has prefixed his honoured signature at top. May his learning and excellence abide, and his pre-eminence increase.

"Mr. N., subject of the sublime Turkish empire—may the Lord preserve and keep it—bought with his own property, not that of others, of the seller, the writer of this document, the humble N. being present, together with the purchaser in this law-sitting, he then sold him by a true and permanent sale what is his own and in his possession, and transferred and committed to him universally the legal disposal of it, having purchased it in the way of legal Estakhar according to a legal title deed dated rajah twelve hundred and seventy-three, the property having accordingly been in his full permanent and abiding possession without any objection or opposition having been made to him on this score up to the time of this definitive true legal and authentic sale—namely, the whole of the well-known share of three keerats, from the whole of twenty-four keerats, situate in the holy city of Jerusalem, near Damascus-gate in the Zarahny-street, and is known now by the name of Dar-el-Burahy, and is now in the possession of Rev. N., and comprises an upper room and an open space in front of it, and a lower room (formerly two), and an open arching, a kitchen, a water-closet, and a small arched magazine, and a water-cistern for gathering rain-water, and open spaces and partances universally, compounds, and legal rights:—The boundaries of which are:—southward, the thoroughfare of the lane and the house-door; eastward—the house formerly belonging to M., and now in the possession of N.; northward, a house bequeathed to the Greek convent; westward, the thoroughfare between this and the house of Rev. M., joined to it by an arching, beneath of which is the thoroughfare:—Sold all rights belonging to the same, together with all its partances universally, its passages, its sewers, its compounds, and whatever is known by it or ascribed to it, together with every right belonging to it in law—a true and lawful sale; a permanent, definitive, and authentic purchase, in which is no subterfuge nor any flaw that could invalidate it, comprising acceptance and receipt on conditions of validity and obligation at a price the amount of which is four thousand piastres, a price immediately received by the hand of the writer of his the aforesaid seller from the hand of the aforesaid purchaser, according to the confession of the seller, who received the same from the purchaser, a legal acknowledgment in virtue of which the conscience of the aforesaid purchaser is cleared of the whole of the price named above, and of every part of it, and legally absolved by receipt, a disbursement, so that the definitive act of sale has taken place between them in regard to all this in acceptance and receipt and disbursement true and legal by bodily touch in token of agreement between them, and by a legal contract. Wheresoever, therefore, anything comprised in or belonging to this property be found there its appropriation is valid, because obligatory by law. Then, after the completion of this, the writer of this, the aforesaid seller, called witnesses to attest that he absolves the conscience of the aforesaid purchaser from all allegations of overreaching, imposition, or deception in this sale, an absolution in law. The purchaser has legally accepted for himself this transaction, being well aware of the stipend of Haker for this afore-described share in this aforesaid house, amounting to ten piastres per annum, to the bequest of the late Mr. N. NEW YORK.—A decision has just been pronounced in this State which affords a striking illustration of the evils of hasty legislation. The revised statutes of New York contained, among others, "An Act concerning Crimes and Punishments;" wherein it was provided that certain offences should be punishable with death, and that "the punishment of death shall in all cases be inflicted by hanging the convict by the neck until he be dead." Last winter the philanthropists made an effort to have capital punishment abolished. They had a long hearing before the Assembly Committee, which resulted in a compromise, providing that only treason and murder in the first degree should be hereafter punished with death, and that the sentence should not be carried into execution within a year after conviction, during which time the convict should be kept at hard labour. The repealing clause of the new Act was intended to embrace all the clauses of the old Act inconsistent with it; but, by some error, it included the words quoted above. It is decided by the Court that the new law, having abolished the only statute defining hanging as the mode of punishment, and itself prescribing no new mode, there is now no known sentence which can be pronounced against a person convicted of murder in the first degree. Thus, by the possible mistake of a clerk, or the trick of an agent, the Legislature of the State of New York have been forced into the temporary abolition of capital punishment.

THE HAGUE.—International Criminal Law.—A subject of very grave importance to the mercantile community will shortly occupy the attention of the superior criminal court at the Hague. In January last a Dutchman, named Charles Van Gelder, who was employed in a confidential capacity by Mr. Stubbs, the principal of a firm in Gresham-street, absconded with money and other property belonging to that gentleman, and it turned out that he had also committed forgeries to a very considerable extent, and had obtained discount upon bills purporting to bear the acceptances of city firms, some of which, upon inquiry, it was discovered were non-existent, and others were forgeries. By escaping to the Hague he eluded the English police, since no extradition treaty exists between this country and Holland, and as he declared himself a Dutch subject, the Dutch government refused to deliver him up. The important question then arose whether the Dutch criminal courts could take cognizance of a criminal offence committed in a foreign country. Through the interference of the British minister, the law officers of the Netherlands government were at length induced to take an interest in the matter, and to see the very grave importance of the question, and they resolved that the matter should at all events undergo solemn judicial consideration by the law officers of the crown. With this view Mr. Stubbs and all the other witnesses required to support the case were summoned to appear, and they gave their evidence, and the prisoner himself, in accordance with the law of Holland, underwent several interrogatories by the judges, and after a long inquiry, and a strenuous endeavour on the part of the prisoner's advocate to prevent such a course being taken, he has at length been sent to take his trial before the supreme court of justice at the Hague, upon the charge of forging acceptances to certain bills of exchange, the alleged offences having been committed in England. The case now, therefore, stands for trial before the judges, when the point of law will be discussed whether a subject, committing forgery or fraud in a foreign country, can be convicted in Holland. Should this point be decided in the affirmative, the comparative immunity which has been available to persons absconding to that country will be destroyed.

The Upper Canada Law Journal informs us that an Act has been passed for the province of Lower Canada providing for the establishment of a complete system of judicial statistics.

Review.

A Treatise on the Law of Merchant Shipping. By DAVID MACLACHLAN, M.A., of the Middle Temple, Barrister at Law. London: Maxwell.

It is now more than half a century since Lord Tenterden (then Mr. Abbott) wrote his famous treatise on the "Law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen." For more than a century previously, no work of any pretensions on this subject had been achieved by an Englishman. In the eighteenth century the great text book of lawyers on maritime and commercial law was that of Molloy,* which, even in those days, went through as many editions as since then Abbott on Shipping has attained. If we except the unquestionably valuable additions which have been made from time to time to the latter, by its accomplished editor, and the recent collection of leading cases on mercantile and maritime law by Mr. Tudor, comparatively nothing has been done since the commencement of the present century by English text writers towards the elucidation of one of the most important and comprehensive branches of law, and one, moreover, which it might be supposed beforehand would be deemed of all others the most attractive for our jurists. The remark of Lord Tenterden in the preface to his first edition, although he did what he then could to make it no longer applicable, has just as much force now as it had then. "The absence," said his lordship, "of a general and established code of maritime law which almost every other European nation possesses, seems to render a collection of the principal points of that law peculiarly necessary for English merchants and English lawyers." Since those words were penned a vast number of additions have been made in the statute law relating to ships and shipowners. A great revolution, moreover, has taken place in the mercantile marine not only of England but of all countries. On the one hand, the invention of steam engines and other appliances of science, by the vast changes which they have wrought in the material of our commercial navy, and in commerce generally, and on the other, many modern treaties and conventions involving questions of maritime law, combine in proving the necessity of some large and systematic treatise on the English law of merchant shipping, including not merely such questions as relate to owners, mariners, and freight, but those larger topics which belong to international maritime law. There is perhaps nothing in the legal literature of this country more surprising than the fact that no English lawyer has ever yet (until the last year or two) seriously essayed a work on this great subject. The work of Mr. Tudor, to which we have already referred, may be considered the first important effort in this direction; but its plan necessarily involved fragmentary treatment, the design of the learned author never having gone beyond the selection and illustration of some leading cases on mercantile and maritime law.

Whether we regard the origin of modern maritime law as traceable through the Roman jurists to such sources as the laws of Rhodes, or regard it as a species of unwritten law common to all civilized states, in either view, surely no department of jurisprudence can offer a more desirable field to an English jurist. Few topics at all events have been more laboured by foreign writers on law. An Italian lawyer of the latter part of the last century wrote in his native tongue a universal dictionary, and in the French language a treatise, on the maritime law of Europe.* An American lawyer has translated the last mentioned work, although but very few copies of the translation have found their way to Europe. The Germans can boast of Heineccius,† and the several writers referred to by him, Engelbrecht,‡ and other writers on maritime law. Among the numerous Dutch and Flemish lawyers who have written upon the subject may be mentioned, Roccus,§ Pardessus,|| and Hübner§. The French can boast of numerous works of the same kind: Pothier of course treats largely and in detail of ships and shipping; and every French lawyer may find any question coming within the range of the subject in the Code de Commerce. Spain also has its maritime law authors. It appears not unreasonable, therefore, for an English jurist in this latter half of the nineteenth century to look for the favourable reception of a book which is not confined merely to the class of questions to be found in Abbott on Shipping. Previously to and for some time after the last-mentioned work had left the hands of its author, the Admiralty Court of England existed in scarcely more than a name; and Lord Stowell, its first great judge, who, in fact, laid the foundations, and almost reared the superstructure of English maritime law, himself expressed his shame at the small amount of judicial work which he had to do. The labours of Lord Stowell, however, have been almost rivalled by those of one of his successors who now presides over that court; and probably in no other country in the world is there any richer storehouse of materials for a great book on maritime law than is to be found in the judgments of these two learned civilians and in the decisions of our English tribunals generally. Mr. MacLachlan, therefore, in what he has undertaken had not only the satisfaction of knowing that he was about to engage in a work almost of necessity to English law, but had further the advantage of dealing with a large mass of most valuable, although somewhat undigested, matter. Not only does the general scheme and design of his treatise differ in numerous important respects from that of Lord Tenterden's Treatise; but to a large extent the very subject matter itself is new to English text books. Mr. MacLachlan favours us in his preface with the following account of his general plan:—

"The following treatise, planned upon the order of the subject, opens with the acquisition of ship property, and those dealings with it, when acquired, which are recognised and sanctioned by law. It passes from this to the various relations of the owners in connection with such property—among themselves, with their agents, to the world at large, the mariners in particular, and generally to the owners of other ships that may be met with on the maritime highway. Thus far it comprises only those dealings and relations, legally considered, which begin and end immediately in the possession of this description of property, forming what may be regarded as the first grand division of the subject. The second division is concerned with the commercial purpose of ship property, and all those obligations which are severally contracted by the owner and the freighter in the employment of it for that end, whether expressly stipulated between them at the first, or implied by law from the relation thus formed, in connexion with the course of subsequent events. The subject, in this view of it, appears distinctively massed about a few centres, presenting for the investigation of it a plan that easily admits of the full discussion of particulars whilst it naturally combines towards the general development of the whole, and immediately accessible in any part of it to a mere stranger. The complete conception of a work of this nature comprehends a variety of subjects not hitherto considered within the same treatise. Ships regarded as property, although engaging so large an amount of British capital, did not enter into Mr. Abbott's scheme. The General Maritime Law and the Law of Nations, touching international questions, have heretofore been dismissed with the casual notice of a few decisions; and yet, as administered in the Prize Court, they affect shipping, and merchandise, and the profits of the carrying trade, being universal in the applicability of their principles, and bearing sensibly in their effect upon the interests of communities and the prosperity of a nation."

We are able to say after a careful examination of the book before us not only that the author's own account of it is correct, but that he scarcely does himself justice in it. Unpretending as is his statement of his labours they will be found upon examination to have been of a magnitude and character which would be held by most persons to justify what brother Jonathan calls "taller talk." Simple as the general arrangement of the work and the grouping of its details may appear from Mr. MacLachlan's preface, there are evidences throughout the entire book not only of great skill in dealing with new subject matter, and arranging it in a natural and convenient manner, but of untiring labour in the attempt to obtain perfect completeness. With much searching we have been able to discover very few omissions, and even where they occur there generally appears to be some reason for them. As a rule every reported case bearing upon the topic under consideration is noticed by the author; while he is always remarkable for his self-denying abstinence from unnecessary statement of facts, needlessly long quotations from well-known judgments, and the other machinery of modern book-making. Whatever Mr. MacLachlan has written is evidently the result of his best consideration, and is expressed with precision and conciseness.

Another creditable feature of this work is, that while the author rarely fears to approach the most difficult questions of international maritime law, and treats them with more boldness than is usually shown by English jurists in this province, he is never tempted away into the regions of mere speculation, but always keeps his eye closely upon the practical value of what he is doing. Indeed, we hardly know how to give a higher praise to a legal author, or we should be disposed to award it to Mr. MacLachlan for his performance; for we have seldom met with a law book that deserves more praise in many respects than that now before us.

As to the omissions to which we have already alluded, we may mention the subject of marine insurance. Lord Tenterden omitted it purposely, as the subject had already been well treated; and since then Mr. (now Sir Joseph) Arnould has done all perhaps that is needed on that subject. The omission of it, nevertheless, in a work devoted to general maritime law requires some explanation, and is not unlikely to cause the overlooking of a class of decisions which, although they come under the general head of marine insurance, nevertheless involve many nice questions touching other points of maritime law, ex gr., the implied warranty of seaworthiness in insurance contracts, what amounts to, and what justifies, a deviation from the usual course, &c. The space devoted by Mr. MacLachlan to the question of the right of search and to the doctrine of contraband of war, is so limited as to disable him from introducing into his text all the authorities which he might usefully have cited. Probably the fact that Mr. Tudor had already collected all the cases on these topics induced Mr. MacLachlan to treat them more summarily than he otherwise would have done. The chapter on general average is characterised by lucid arrangement, and gives a succinct account of English law on that important subject, but it barely alludes in passing to the troublesome differences in the laws of various countries, as to the nature of the loss, damage, and expense, allowable in general average, and in the principle for the ascertainment of the same respectively. Mr. MacLachlan's explanation probably would be that he was not writing an account of the maritime law of Europe and America, but of England; and although he was willing to discuss doctrines of the latter, so far as they were common to the English and other systems of jurisprudence, he was not obliged to go out of his way to point out the differences. The question of general average, however, is eminently one of international importance; and a book professing to deal with the law of nations, so as it affects maritime law, ought not to be all but silent on this head.

THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS.

The following learned and very useful paper on the Law of Judgments as affecting Real Property, was read by Mr. G. J. Johnson, of Birmingham, at the late meeting of this Society:—

The clauses as to judgments in Lord St. Leonards' Act of last session (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38) are the fifth legislative attempt during the last twenty years to amend this branch of the law.

It was supposed by many of us, and hoped by all, that this last Act would remove all the difficulties, and abolish all the inconveniences which the four previous Acts have created. This supposition is unfortunately not correct; for although the Act is a great improvement, yet it is tainted with the vice of all previous legislation on the subject, viz., that of amendment without consolidation, and leaves the old law in full force in two classes of cases:—

1. As to all judgments entered up before 23rd July, 1860, even as against purchasers and mortgagees.
2. As to all judgments either before or after the Act, so far as concerns the judgment debtors themselves and their creditors, and all other persons except purchasers and mortgagees.

We have not therefore yet got rid of the law of judgments; and the object of this paper is to describe briefly the state of that law, the extent to which it is altered by Lord St. Leonards' Act, and incidentally to show how many difficulties have occurred by the neglect of the principle that there should be no amendment without consolidation.

Singular as it may appear, we cannot thoroughly understand the subject without beginning with the Statute of Westminster the Second (13 Edw. 1, c. 18, A.D. 1285); and if any one thinks this pedantic and impractical, I would refer him to the recent case of Fuller v. Redman, (reported in the Law Journal for the present year), in which an unfortunate administrator had his payments to simple contract creditors disallowed as against a judgment creditor, only because this statute was still in force and had been overlooked in the four Acts for the amendment of the law of judgments.

This Statute of Westminster the Second, then, first affected real property with judgments by enabling the judgment creditor to have at his election either a feri facias or the half of the debtor's freehold lands. From this election the writ under which the lands were taken was called an elegit. It is to be noted, that the distinction between freeholds and leaseholds, which has ever since prevailed and which is the basis of the legislation of the last session, dates its origin from this early period, for the debtor's leasehold interests might either be taken in the entirety, as personal property, under a fi. fa. or a moiety attached under an elegit as an interest in lands.

Again, between freeholds and leaseholds there was also this difference, that the moiety of the freeholds was bound from the signing of the judgment; but the leaseholds under a fi. fa. only from the time of the delivery of the writ to the sheriff (29 Car. 2, c. 4, s. 16).

For the protection of heirs and executors, purchasers and mortgagees, it was provided by 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20 (A.D. 1692), that no judgment should affect them unless docketed as there directed.

So stood the law at the time of the passing of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. The object of that Act was to extend the creditor's legal remedy to all the debtor's real estate instead of half his freeholds; to give him increased equitable remedies; and to establish an improved system of docketing, called registration, for the information and protection, not only of the purchasers and mortgagees (as the old dockets) but of creditors.

Here occurred mistake the first. Instead of repealing the statute of Westminster the Second and starting afresh, it was simply provided that a judgment creditor might have the whole of his debtor's real estate under an elegit, but that no judgment by virtue of that Act should affect purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors unless and until registered.

The result was, that as soon as 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 was passed a judgment creditor had two courses open to him, i. e., either to docket under the old law and take half his debtor's freehold lands, or to register under the new law and take the whole of his debtor's real estate. It must not be supposed that this was not likely to be done: it was; and for this reason, that under the old law a judgment creditor was entitled to relief in equity against a purchaser or mortgagee if he had given express notice, although he had not docketed (Davis v. Earl of Strath- more, 16 Ves. 419) and as it was thought (and afterwards expressly provided) that under the new law notice was nothing without registration, a creditor who had not registered might act on the principle that "half a loaf was better than no bread," and so give notice and take his chance under the old law.

As soon as this mistake was discovered, and in the very next session, the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11 was passed expressly to correct it, and instead of correcting it made the matter worse by simply closing the old dockets (s. 1) and leaving unaffected the judgment required to be docketed. In other words, it left the old remedy outstanding and simply withdrew the old protection against it! The creditor's right to take half his debtor's lands was still untouched, and though he could not make it available at law, the unreversed decision in Davis v. Strathmore enabled him to do so in equity as against a purchaser or mortgagee with notice. Indeed, it was mooted whether express notice without registration was not a ground of equitable relief under the new Act. To settle these doubts a third Act was passed (3 & 4 Vict. c. 82) which certainly did settle that notice however express without registration, did not avail under the new law, but still left it open to a judgment creditor to charge one half of his debtor's lands in equity under the old law, by giving express notice, although he had not registered under the new law and could not docket under the old. To stop this gap a fourth Act was necessary—18 Vict. c. 14. Sect. 4 of this Act finally declared that express notice of any judgment without registration under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 should not affect a purchaser, mortgagee, or creditor, either at law or in equity.

So much for the first serious error, that of leaving two concurrent and conflicting systems in operation at one time. In addition to this there were two other omissions in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. First it did not declare whether registration was in itself notice, and secondly it left it very doubtful whether the former distinction between freeholds and leaseholds (i. e. that freeholds were bound from the entry of the judgment, but leaseholds only from the issuing of the execution) survived in the new system.

These omissions were supplied by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, in the worst possible way, i. e., by reference to the old law instead of declaring the new. Sect. 5 of the last-mentioned Act provides that as to purchasers and mortgagees judgments under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, should not affect lands "further or more extensively" than if such judgments had been docketed under the old law. It would have taken fewer words to have said plainly (1) that registration should not of itself be notice to purchasers or mortgagees, and (2) that as to them, leasehold interests should not be bound until execution issued. But the Legislature preferred to throw upon the profession the task of finding out what the old law was, and if we could find out that, then telling us that the new system did not affect lands "further or more extensively" than the old.

If the practitioner looked up the old cases he would find it was decided in the reign of Charles II. (Churchill v. Grove, Freeman's Chy. Ca. 176), that docketing was not notice. Few solicitors felt quite satisfied with these musty authorities until they were recognized as valid under the new law in Lane v. Jackson, 20 Beav. 539, where it was held not only that registration was not notice, but also that there was no obligation on a purchaser to invite notice by searching the register. Although if he does search he is fixed with notice of judgments on the register, whether he finds them or not (Procter v. Cooper, 2 Drew. 1).

Notwithstanding these decisions I have frequently had occasion to discuss this point with other solicitors, and have found the notion to be very common that registration was of itself notice, and I contend that it is a point which ought to have been clearly settled on the face of the Act itself.

But it may be asked, if notice without registration is invalid; and registration without notice also inoperative as against a purchaser or mortgagee, why search at all? why invite notice by search? One sufficient reason is that a subsequent purchaser who does search may find a judgment was registered of which if you had searched, you would have been fixed with notice, and in the nature of things you cannot prove that you did not search, and did not have notice, and such a title cannot be forced on a purchaser (Freer v. Hesse, 4 De Gex M. & G. 495).

The other point as to the precise effect of the new Acts on leaseholds on which the Legislature ambiguously declared that such Acts were not to operate "further or more extensively" than the old as against purchasers or mortgagees, occasioned much difference of opinion. By the cases of Westbrook v. Blythe, 3 E. & B. 737 (A. D. 1854), at law; and Harris v. Davison, 15 Sim. 128 (A.D. 1846); and Gore Bousser, 3 Sm & G. 1 (A.D. 1855), it may be taken to be settled that as against the judgment debtor himself, and all others claiming under him, except purchasers and mortgagees without notice, leaseholds are now bound from the time of the judgment entered in the same way as freeholds, and that a judgment creditor is in a better position than under the old law, in that his right to seize at law and his lien in equity takes date from the entry of the judgment, whereas under the old law he had no right either at law or in equity until the elegit or fi. fa. actually issued. But as against purchasers and mortgagees without notice the judgment creditor's right takes date only from the time of execution issued, and it would seem (as stated in the late Mr. Baron Watson's argument in Westbrook v. Blyth, although this has never been decided) that the creditor could only take half of the leaseholds. This is one of the fruits of legislation by reference.*

Another serious omission in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and its three amendment Acts was the case of heirs, executors, and administrators. The effect of the Statute of Westminster the Second, was to bind them to pay judgment debts in priority to simple contract debts, whether they had notice or not. The 4 & 5 W. & M. c. 20, furnished them with a protection by obliging judgments to be docketed as a condition precedent to their obtaining priority. The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, took away this protection, but (as was decided by the before cited case of Fuller v. Redman, L. J. 1860, Ch. 324), left the mischief remaining by omitting all mention of heirs, executors, or administrators in the class of persons protected by non-registration and non-notice. This is cured by sect. 3 of Lord St. Leonards' Act.

Now all this mischief and complexity has been brought about by the neglect of that most salutary rule—no alteration without consolidation. If at the time of the passing of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the Statute of Westminster the Second, the root of the old system had been taken away we should not have required four amendment Acts to lop off its different branches. It does not fall within the scope of this paper to advert to the other vexed questions arising on these Acts, such as the effect of re-registration, and other points. I have only adverted to those questions as to freeholds and leaseholds, and notice, necessary to introduce the new Act.

Now for the Act itself. The preamble states that it is desirable to do three things.

1. To place freehold interests in real estate on the same footing with leaseholds as to judgments so far as purchasers or mortgagees are concerned [i.e. to bind them by the execution and not by the judgment].
2. To enable such purchasers and mortgagees to ascertain when the execution has issued; and
3. To protect them against delay in levying the execution.

These three objects are effected in the following way, as to the first:—No judgment is to effect any land of whatever tenure as to purchasers or mortgagees unless and until such judgment is followed by execution.

[So far, therefore, as purchasers and mortgagees are concerned mere judgments entered up subsequently to 23rd July, 1860, have no operation. It is only an execution that they have to fear.]

The second object, that of enabling purchasers and mortgagees to ascertain when execution has issued is accomplished.

1. By establishing a new registry of executions distinct from, although connected with, the registry of judgments; and
2. By making it necessary that the execution shall be so registered before the purchase or mortgage. If not so registered, it does not affect a purchaser or mortgagee, even though he has notice of it.

On this part of the Act it is to be carefully noted that we shall henceforth have two registers:—

1. A register of executions, affecting purchasers and mortgagees only; and
2. A register of judgments, affecting all others than purchasers and mortgagees, and affecting them as to judgments before 23rd July, 1860.

From two letters of the registrar's chief clerk, published in the legal periodicals in August last, it appears that the practice proposed to be followed by the register office, with the concurrence of Lord St. Leonards himself, will render it necessary—

That the judgment creditor should register his judgment in the judgment register, and also register his execution in the execution register, but that purchasers or mortgagees need only search the judgment register as heretofore, as they will find a memorandum added to every judgment whenever an execution has been issued. When such memorandum is not found, it may be presumed that execution has not been issued, and therefore could not be registered. Where such a memorandum is found, the register of executions must be searched to see if the second requisite—viz. registration of execution—has been complied with.

Upon this section the old question is sure to arise, will the registration of execution be of itself notice? The committee of the Birmingham Law Society in a report on the bill, in which I had the honour of assisting, earnestly suggested that a declaratory clause on this point should be inserted in the Act. This has not been done, but I submit that registration of an execution is not notice under this Act to a purchaser or mortgagee. The point is not free from all doubt, for it may be contended that as the declared object of the Act is to "place on the same footing" freehold and leasehold estates, and as leaseholds were at the time of the passing of the Act bound by the issuing of a fi. fa., freeholds to be on the same footing must be bound by the issuing of the execution, if and when registered before the purchase or mortgage. The reply to this is, that leaseholds were only bound by the issuing of an execution, when that execution was a fi. fa. treating such leaseholds as goods. Leaseholds were never bound by an elegit from the time it was issued only from the time of execution. And granting even that s. 1 of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, that a fi. fa. shall not bind goods until notice, does not apply to terms of years, so as to make notice necessary, there is nothing in the Act under discussion to destroy the difference of operation between a fi. fa. and an elegit, and to give an increased operation to an elegit. Again, and I rest the matter chiefly on this point, the protection acquired by non-notice is part of the general doctrine of courts of equity which supplements and controls all the statutory provisions, unless this jurisdiction of equity is taken away by express words. The uniform doctrine of courts of equity was that docketing was not notice, that registration is not notice, and, bearing in mind that registration of executions under this Act is not an original system but only an addition and accessory to the already existing registration of judgments this doctrine will surely be held (in the absence of express provision to the contrary), to apply as well to the derivative and accessory registration of executions as to the existing registry of judgments.

The third object of the Act, that of protecting purchasers and mortgagees from delay in the execution of the writ, is accomplished by providing that such writ must be executed and put into force within three calendar months after registration. In other words it remains a charge on the land for three months only; and as there is no provision for re-registration as in the case of judgments, it is presumed that it cannot be kept alive beyond three months.

The results of our enquiry into the Law of Judgments may be summed up thus.

As far as the debtor himself is concerned, and all persons claiming under him, except purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, the judgment may be enforced by an elegit at law on all his real estate, and is a charge thereon in equity; and no registration is required for that purpose.

As far as purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors are concerned, the question how far they are affected will in future depend on whether the judgment was entered up before or after the 23rd July, 1860.

1. If the judgment was entered up before 23rd July, 1860, it must be registered under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and such purchaser or mortgagee must have notice of such registration. Neither notice without registration nor registration without notice will do. There must be registration and notice, but notice will be implied from search of the register.

Any judgment entered up before 23rd July, 1860, may, it would seem, be kept alive indefinitely by re-registration every five years.

And it would seem also, (from Beavan v. Earl of Oxford, 4 W. R. 112) that if it were not continuously registered e.g. if the five years expired in 1860, and it were not re-registered until 1861, a purchaser or mortgagee with notice in 1862 would be bound. Hence arises the necessity for keeping in view the old law.

2. If the judgment was entered up after the 23rd of

* It is not yet decided how far sect. 1 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, "The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1846," which enacts that goods shall not be bound by the mere delivery of writ to the sheriff as before, but only after notice that the writ is so delivered, applies to terms of years. The argument that it does not is derived from the preamble of the Act, declaring its object to be to remedy inconveniences to persons engaged in trade. The argument that it does is that the same term "goods" in the Statute of Frauds has been held to comprise terms for years.

July, 1860, it must as to purchasers and mortgagees not only be registered, as before, as a judgment, but must ripen into an execution, and be registered and enforced as provided by this Act; but as creditors are not mentioned in this Act they are in the old position, i.e. the same as though it had been entered up before the 23rd of July, 1860.

I have exhausted my limits in the attempt to explain what the law is; I cannot conclude, however without observing that the present anomalous system will soon require alteration. I fear that the existence of two concurrent registers affecting distinct classes of persons, will, like the collision of the old dockets and new register, occasion difficulties which we cannot see at present.

Independently of that, it seems to be clear that if it is good policy to give a judgment creditor a claim on the real estate of his debtor, it is a departure from that policy to reduce his claim to a shadow, as it will be under this Act. If, on the other hand, it is right so severely to restrict these claims as against purchasers and mortgagees, it is equally right and incomparably more convenient to relieve purchasers and mortgagees altogether from them.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CAUSES.

The following paper by Mr. J. Campbell Smith, advocate, suggesting some amendments in the procedure of criminal courts in England and Scotland, was read by that learned gentleman in the Jurisprudence Department of the recent Congress at Glasgow:—

I assume as settled that the end of criminal prosecution is to punish crime, and that every crime is a fact to be proved by witnesses according to the rules of evidence to the satisfaction of a jury of twelve or fifteen men. Besides the jury, the agents in a criminal cause are the prosecutor who accuses, the counsel of the accused, and the judge who decides when disputes arise as to the admissibility of evidence or the relevancy of the allegation of crime. The duty of all these is well settled both in England and Scotland, and neither country has much to borrow from the other nor much to amend. But there are some improvements which both might adopt with advantage.

One very great improvement I think England might borrow from Scotland, and that is the institution of a staff of local prosecutors for the public, to investigate crime and to collect evidence of crime to be used against the criminal at his trial. In Scotland this is done by the procurators-fiscal, who are stationed in each district. The procurator-fiscal, when he receives information of some criminal act, directs investigation, examines witnesses, and sends the result of his inquiry to the crown-agent, who lays it before the Lord Advocate, who is public prosecutor for all Scotland, as the Attorney-General is, in theory, for England, and he or his assistants called deputes, direct a trial, or "no further proceedings," according as they consider the guilt of the accused can be established or not. The entire machinery is very simple and is not at all expensive, and it is such that crime cannot be whispered about and escape. But in England there is no machinery. The Attorney-General is public prosecutor, but he has no corps of observation posted over the country to give him information of crime. When a crime is committed no one is bound to bring the offender to justice. Any private individual may do so, but he can do it only at considerable cost; and if it turn out that the prosecution should fail, he may be ruined by an action of damages for "malicious prosecution." The consequence is, that no private individual who has not been deeply injured will run the risk, and even though he has been deeply injured he may sink his sense of public duty and his desire of revenge under his indolence and his fears. And there are some crimes which, though tending to debase and dissolve society, no private person would feel impelled to have exposed and punished. I know that in England crimes that are notorious and sorely nameable pass with impunity. No one finds it to be for his interest to seek them out, prosecute, and see them punished: and I believe that there is no crime whatever except murder which does not in England frequently remain unprosecuted for want of a staff of public prosecutors acting under the Attorney-General or some other head.

So far as I can learn, Englishmen are agreed that their present system is not what it ought to be. Lord Brougham has exposed its great defects oftener than once. Some who, like his lordship, have studied the matter, believe that the Scotch system is better, but how to transplant it to England is the difficulty, which, however, is not, as I think, very formidable. Our procurators-fiscal investigate into all suspicious cases of death, and their investigations, though ex parte, are not less satisfactory than those of the English coroner, who is, we in Scotland consider, a somewhat officious and incompetent functionary, prone to expose private matters needlessly, and to proclaim on the house top what should be buried in the grave. I wonder if matters could not be arranged so that the English coroner, or some substitute for him, could investigate all crimes with a little less fuss perhaps, if vulgar curiosity will permit of it. I know that there is something to be said for a public investigation; but so long as Dr. Taylor and other scientific men, with either pure or impure copper gauze, seek for the very kernel of crime in private laboratories, I submit that the coroner's public investigation is more of a name than a reality. But I do not quarrel with it, as it is an English institution; all I say is, that a similar or at least equally sufficient process of investigation should be extended to all crimes, and that can be attained only by the appointment of public prosecutors in every county and town to investigate crimes and pursue criminals to conviction. Practically, this may be brought about, so far as I can see, with very little additional expense to the public, in this tolerable way at least—namely, by appointing local prosecutors, and a staff of barristers subordinate to the Attorney-General, and letting them be paid by fees as self-appointed prosecutors are now; who, varying in each case, cannot reap the full benefits of experience, whether their zeal be stimulated by fees or not.

On the other hand, Scotland could borrow a reform from the criminal courts of England, and that is the method of reserving points of law that arise during a trial for the deliberate consideration of a full bench of judges. In Scotland, three judges sit in the High Court of Justiciary, and two on circuit, and they are under the necessity of deciding off-hand and in the most summary manner very difficult questions of law. The consequence is, that the most diverse and conflicting decisions are given. One set of judges decide that an attempt to steal is not a crime; and another, that an attempt to pick pockets is a crime. The High Court decides, that selling a pledged article without authority is not theft, and a judge on circuit lays it down to a jury that it is theft. One judge tells a jury that before they can convict a mother of infanticide, there must be proof of complete living birth, as the judges of England always do, and the woman is acquitted, and another judge does not lay down that law, and after evidence precisely the same as that on which the other was acquitted, a poor wretch is convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for life or to death. The civil court refers to the oath of a party denying marriage for proof of marriage, and in the circuit court a judge tells the jury that the oath of one witness who admits marriage proves nothing. In fact, the contradictory and arbitrary judgments of the judges of Justiciary are somewhat astonishing, and the only way to end a conflict which tends to render them ridiculous, would be to reserve all questions of law for the decision of all the judges of the criminal court.

To do this was a pet notion of the celebrated Lord Cockburn, the practical clearness of whose mind was only surpassed by the brilliancy of his humour; and he tried it once with an unfortunate result. In a trial at Inverness, of a woman named Fraser, and her son, for poisoning a man who was her husband and his father, a packet was offered to be put in evidence as a production, which was described as a "sealed packet," when in point of fact the seal had been cut all round, and the packet opened after seal. Counsel objected to the admission of this misdescribed packet; and Lords Cockburn and Ivory reserved the point for the consideration of the High Court. The prisoners were found guilty of murder, and the case against them was continued to an indefinite day. Ultimately it was held by the High Court that the failure to name a day was fatal, because in the Court of Justiciary all diets are peremptory, and owing to that omission the prisoners escaped, and Lord Cockburn's experiment failed. But the present Lord Justice General, whose words always mean fully what they express, doubted the competency of reserving a point of law in the course of a trial; and I hardly think any judge would venture again to make the experiment, so that we can obtain this reform only through legislation.

There was another matter in Scotch criminal procedure of which Lord Cockburn disapproved, and that is the verdict of "not proven." It is difficult to feel the force of his argument on this point; and I have seen that whenever the attention of the English public has been called to it, the honest good sense of England has thought it a right verdict, because it is in many cases a true verdict, and the only true verdict possible on the evidence. The truth of that form of verdict in all doubtful cases is its vindication and recommendation to English juries if they choose to adopt it, and it is not right either that juries should be driven to say on their oaths "guilty," when there may be a doubt, or "not guilty," when on the probabilities before them that verdict can scarcely be true.

If the number of men requisite to form a jury were not fixed, a good deal might be said to show that fifteen men should not be kept from their business, as in Scotland, to try criminals who have stolen a quarter of a pound of butter, or a handkerchief, or a sheet. A smaller number might do, say six or nine, and the verdict ought to be returned by a majority of not less than two-thirds. That it should be impossible for a simple majority of one to find a fellow creature guilty of murder, is a state of matters to shudder at; and it ought not to be. The last trial for murder, in Glasgow, save one, was nearly a tragedy owing to this state of the law; for seven of the jury were for finding two sisters, the Milligans, guilty of that frightful crime, without any evidence at all.

When one hears of a verdict of that kind he is inclined to doubt, as I often do, whether administering an oath to juries be not a waste of time. I hardly think it has any influence at all. The honest men make up their minds (if they do not do as the judge bids them) without thinking of an oath, and just as they would do in reference to any of the affairs of ordinary life. Indeed, some judges tell them to do so, if counsel have ventured to call their attention to the obligation of an oath; and my conviction is that it has not the least effect, and that almost universally the motives of jurymen are such that they do not need it.

I should even go further and doubt the utility of administering oaths to witnesses. An honest man will not tell a lie although not on oath, and a dishonest man will not refrain from lying for any moral or religious consideration. The punishment of perjury alone deters from telling what is not true; and falsehood in a court of justice could still be an indictable offence, although oaths were abolished. To those who are in the habit of taking oaths they become quite indifferent; and it is only necessary to hear a few policemen swear, to appreciate the levity with which oaths are taken, and to cross-examine a few policemen to know that the superficial levity has penetrated to the conscience and beyond it. I believe the simple word of a policeman, or a lawyer, or a doctor, or any skilled witness, as readily as his oath. Generally, professional men feel the weight of honour and reputation quite as much as of religion; and a mind which owns the force of religion will not be dead to honour. So that it comes to this:—with honest witnesses no oath is needed; and over dishonest witnesses there is no check except the fear of punishment of the most immediate kind.

But if oaths are to be administered, as they will be for some time yet, I think that it should be left to either of the parties to call upon the judge to administer the oath to witnesses who in their opinion may be more surely bound by it, and that the Scotch system of administering them is better than the English, as it gives the judge who says the words which the witness repeats, an opportunity of seeing through the witness, if he have any faculty in that way, and it has, besides, a more solemn effect than if it be done by the usher or other inferior officer of court. To a student of physiology I fancy kissing a dirty New Testament which has been kissed by thousands is neither a pleasant nor a solemn operation.

The Scotch law admits in evidence against a prisoner one statement not given on oath, which is what is called his "declaration." As soon as possible after his apprehension, and before he can take advice, which, indeed, is shut out from him, the accused is taken before the sheriff or other magistrate, who tells him what the crime is with which he is charged; that the procurator-fiscal, who is present, is to ask him questions about his participation in that crime; and that he need not answer them unless he please, but that his answers will be taken down, and may be used in evidence against him. If the accused be an experienced criminal, or an intelligent one, he knows how much the declaration told against himself on some former occasion, or how it led to the conviction of some of his associates, so he tells the fiscal his age, that he is an Irishman and unmarried, and declines to answer all questions as to the charge made against him. But if he be inexperienced in criminal matters, if he has not been posted up by wary rogues as to the dangers of giving a declaration, if it be his first offence, and his nature is comparatively simple and innocent, he perhaps confesses or enters into awkward explanations, or says things that are not exactly true, and then every confession, lame explanation, and little falsehood, is used against him in evidence; the theory of the law being, that every thing he has said may tell against him, but nothing he has said can tell in his favour. I remember seeing two men tried at Glasgow circuit for the theft of a ham. The evidence by witnesses against the two was the same, but in his declaration the one had said nothing, and the other had denied being in a certain place where he was proved to have been, though he might have forgotten, as he was half-drunk. The judge directed an acquittal of the thief who had declared nothing, and left the case of the other to the jury, who, by a majority, found him guilty—on somewhat insufficient grounds as I thought, though I was not his counsel. And I have seen a great many criminals convicted who would have escaped, had it not been for their unsuspecting "declarations." Some may and do say, "Well and good, these convictions are so much gain to justice." But I say and think differently. I think that to take advantage of a prisoner's ignorance and simplicity, however in accordance with Scotch "pawkins," is to do a mean and dishonourable act, which outrages the moral sense, and which no court of justice in a civilised country should stoop to countenance. Every argument that can be urged in favour of declarations can be urged in favour of torture, of which they are, indeed, a thinly disguised and refined species adapted to this highly refined and delicate age. For the mind can be laid on the rack as well as the body; and to a solitary human creature, suddenly accused of crime, shut off from friend and counsellor, oppressed and confused with terror, smitten down, it may be, by a sense of guilt, the magistrate and the accuser, and the officials that surround them, are neither more nor less than instruments to extract a confession somewhat more conformable to modern notions than the thumbscrew and the iron boot and red-hot pincers. It is high time that Scotch criminal jurisprudence were rid of this blot; and I feel that our help will come either from every one in Scotland getting to know that a declaration is always dangerous and never can serve the accused, or from England saying that unfair advantage ought not to be taken of ignorance and simplicity; for I fear that most of our Scotch lawyers who have served under the Crown as public prosecutors, will be ready to apologize for a system which they find to be very convenient, however hard upon unfortunates who want intelligence and cunning.

I have done, restraining myself from mentioning some small points of no great interest, and from one or two because the state of my information did not enable me to discuss them, and one of them was the very insufficient notice that a prisoner in England gets of the case that is to be made against him. He does not appear to be entitled to a copy of the indictment, and he is not entitled to a list of witnesses, to enable him to inquire into what they have to say against him, and meet it. I dare say the English mind is more rapid in apprehension than the Scotch; yet a system which must abound in surprises ought to exist anywhere except in courts of criminal justice. Probably when England obtains its staff of public prosecutors, prisoners will obtain fuller information to help them to prepare their defence.

LAW LECTURES AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Mr. FREDERICK JOHN TURNER, on Conveyancing, Monday, Nov. 12.

Mr. GEORGE WIRGMAN HEMMING, on Equity, Friday, Nov. 16.

Mr. Henry Butterworth, the eminent law publisher of Fleet st., died on Friday, the 2nd inst., rather suddenly, from congestion of the lungs. He was in the 75th year of his age, and was one of the oldest of literary publishers in the metropolis. Mr. Butterworth had been, until shortly before his death, actively engaged in the business with which his name was identified, and in matters of public usefulness.

The Electric and International Company employ nearly two hundred young women at their various offices, and speeches occupying entire pages of the Times have been transmitted from the north and transferred to writing in a few hours by young women alone, and with wonderful accuracy. This success is a great encouragement to those who have the conduct of new institutions where men have not yet gained exclusive possession.

ORDER OF COURT.

Wednesday, the 7th day of November, 1860.

Whereas from the present state of the business before the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls respectively, it is expedient that a portion of the Causes set down before the Lord Chancellor to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, should be transferred to the Master of the Rolls' Book of Causes for hearing.

Now I do hereby, at the request of the Master of the Rolls, order that the several Causes set forth in the schedules hereunto subjoined, be accordingly transferred from the Book of Causes of the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood to that of the Master of the Rolls. And I do further order that all Causes so to be transferred (although the bills of such Causes may have been marked for the Vice-Chancellor, Sir William Page Wood, under the Orders of Court of the 5th of May, 1857—Order VI. of Consolidated Orders—and notwithstanding any Orders therein made by the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Page Wood, or his predecessor), shall hereafter be considered and taken as Causes originally marked for the Master of the Rolls, and be subject to the same regulations as all Causes marked for the Master of the Rolls are subject to by the same Orders. Provided, nevertheless, that no order made by the Vice-Chancellor, Sir William Page Wood, or his predecessor, in any such Causes, shall be varied or reversed otherwise than by the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices. And this Order is to be drawn up by the Registrar, and set up in the several offices of this Court.

CERTAINTY IN LIFE ASSURANCE.

The conditions and limitations contained in Ordinary Life Policies deprive them of present value, and make their ultimate effect dependent upon the result of future investigations, to be commenced only after the death of the assured life.

THE INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY OF SCOTLAND was instituted for the purpose of obviating these defects, and granting indefeasible Policies of complete security.

"CASE FOR THE OPINION OF COUNSEL."

"This Company was formed for the purpose of granting Life Assurance Policies which should be absolutely Indisputable, and the following form of Policy has been adopted. (Copy Policy).

"The Opinion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Mr. J. NAPIER HIGGINS is requested.

"Whether a Policy in the above form would be Disputable by the Company upon any ground whatever, and if so, upon what ground."

"WE ARE OF OPINION THAT (assuming the Assured to have an Insurable Interest in the Life within the Provisions of 14 Geo. III., c. 48) A POLICY IN THE FORM STATED ABOVE WOULD BE INDISPUTABLE BY THE COMPANY, BOTH AT LAW AND IN EQUITY.

"RICHARD BETHELL, Attorney-General.

"J. NAPIER HIGGINS."

"IT IS QUITE COMPETENT to stipulate that the money assured shall be paid, on the sole condition that the party whose life was assured was alive at the date of the Policy, and thus exclude the questions which have so frequently occurred as to the truth or falsehood of the representations which led to the contract. I AM OF OPINION THAT THE FORM OF POLICY SUBMITTED TO ME DOES ACCOMPLISH THIS OBJECT.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Notice has been given in the advertising columns of the morning journals that application is intended to be made to Parliament in the session of 1861, for an Act to authorise and enable the Commissioners of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings to acquire, by compulsory purchase or otherwise, certain houses, tenements, and other buildings in the Liberty of the Rolls, as a site for the proposed Palace of Justice. The boundaries of the site are stated as follows:—on the north and north-west by Carey-street; on the south by Pickett-street Strand, the Strand, and Fleet-street; on the east by Bell-yard; and on the west and south-west by Yeates's-court, Clement's-inn, and the Vestry-house of the parish of St. Clement Danes. There is no doubt that not only the law authorities but Lord Palmerston himself, and other members of the Cabinet, are very desirous to give full effect to the vigorous scheme suggested in the report of the Concentration of Courts Commissioners. During the long vacation the Prime Minister, accompanied by the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, visited the proposed site with the view of making himself personally acquainted with the details of the plan, and the locality of the intended buildings; and we believe that he is prepared to recommend Parliament to resort to the suitors' fee fund—according to the suggestions of the majority of the commissioners—for the sum necessary to carry out this great undertaking.

The Bill "for repealing divers Acts and parts of Acts which have ceased to be in force," has recently been printed. It consists of two short clauses—one repealing the Acts mentioned in the schedule to the extent therein specified; and the other declaring that the Act "shall not be deemed to affect anything already done under any enactment herein comprised, or to affect any right, benefit, obligation, or liability now existing, or capable of hereafter arising, or being employed or enforced under any such enactment; nor shall any such enactment, by reason of its being herein comprised, be deemed to have been in force at the time of the passing of this Act, or at any time heretofore, further or otherwise than it would have been so deemed if this Act had not been passed." The Bill is the first step towards that expurgated edition of the statutes which, under the direction of the Lord Chancellor, the Attorney and Solicitor Generals, has been entrusted to Mr. Reilly and Mr. Wood. The schedule shows first the Acts proposed to be repealed; secondly, the subject; thirdly, the extent of repeal; fourthly, the mode in which the particular enactments have ceased to be in force; and, lastly, the public office to which the Act belongs. This schedule, which includes the statutes relating to departmental administration from the 19 & 20 Vict. to the 11 Geo. 3, has been submitted to the officers of the Customs, Treasury, &c., and having been subjected to a rigorous examination, it is understood that the labours of the learned editors have been ascertained to be singularly accurate and correct. It therefore is to be hoped that the many Acts mentioned in the schedule will speedily be swept away from the overcrowded pages of our Statute Book.

A movement has been set on foot by Lord Brougham for getting up a public dinner, to be given by the English bar in honour of M. Berryer, the great French advocate. We understand that already several of the most eminent members of the profession in this country have signified their approval of the proposition, and that Sir Fitzroy Kelly assists Lord Brougham in making the preparatory arrangements.

The Morning Post of yesterday states that the letter of the Attorney-General (which appears elsewhere in our columns), read by Mr. Morley in his speech at Manchester, was a private communication, and that the use made of it by Mr. Morley was without the consent or knowledge of the Attorney-General.

THE BORGHESE CASE.

This case has been one of the longest, and also one of the most interesting, ever discussed in the Court of Chancery. It occupied fully a fortnight in argument. The examination of Italian lawyers at Rome extended over three months, and their opinions and oral evidence were printed for the information of the Court in the same number of folio volumes. A very high degree of learning and ability were displayed both by the English and Italian advocates, who at such great length discussed the case; and the judgment delivered by Vice-Chancellor Wood on Tuesday last was in every way worthy of the occasion, and of the reputation of that distinguished judge. It is remarkable that when the claimants first gave notice of their alleged rights, Mr. Rolt was consulted as to the validity of the claim, and advised against it. Subsequently, Mr. Rolt became the plaintiff's leading counsel, and argued, with all his accustomed force, against the opinion he had himself expressed. We believe that few English lawyers, looking at the question by the light of English law, and with English habits of thought, would fail to form the same first opinion as Mr. Rolt did. And after hearing all the ingenious reasonings of the Italian lawyers, and endeavouring to consider the question from the point of view assumed by them, it is probable that an English mind would rest finally in the opinion which it had formed at first. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor was in accordance with what we venture to call the primary and obvious view of the case before him. It was admitted that the document in controversy must be expounded by Italian lawyers, according to the rules of Italian law; but after considering a great variety of subtle arguments, the Vice-Chancellor put them one by one aside, and decided the case by the application to it of plain reasoning and of broad principles which belong equally to all legal systems. It would not be unfair to describe the decision, in this case, as a triumph of common sense over technicality.

The suit was founded upon a contract dated 7th March, 1835, preliminary to the marriage of Lady Gwendaline Talbot with a prince of the noble Roman family of Borghese. This contract was signed by Lord Shrewsbury and Prince Borghese, the fathers of the parties to the intended marriage. On the 9th May, 1835, a solemn public instrument was executed before a notary, and there was also a private instrument of even date. The marriage was solemnized two days after the execution of these instruments. Lord Shrewsbury had one other daughter and no son. The Princess Borghese died before her father, and left her husband and one daughter surviving her. That daughter married the Duc di Sora, a Roman noble, and upon her marriage her rights, and those of her father, under her mother's settlement, became vested in her father and herself in equal moieties. Thus the claimants in the suit were the Princess Agnese Borghese, wife of the Duc di Sora, and her father; and the principal defendants were the trustees to whom Lord Shrewsbury gave the bulk of the real and personal estate, over which he had a disposing power, upon certain trusts under which his two daughters and their families took no benefit. The present claim rested upon the 5th clause of the preliminary contract above-mentioned. That contract, and also the two solemn instruments of later date, were in the Italian language, and were executed at Rome, where Lord Shrewsbury resided with his family. The translation of the 5th clause adopted by the Court, was as follows:—

Over and above the aforesaid dowry thus constituted his Excellency the Earl of Shrewsbury assigns from this moment likewise by title of dowry to the lady bride a portion equal to the other heirs in concurrence in his free inheritance cleared from debts and legacies.

By a previous clause Lord Shrewsbury had agreed to pay or secure to his daughter a dowry of £40,000. In addition to that sum, the claimants now demanded half of Lord Shrewsbury's real and personal estate, without deduction for debts or legacies. They claimed "a portion equal to the other heirs in concurrence in his free inheritance," that is, in his unentailed property; and as the only other heir was Lord Shrewsbury's surviving daughter; the "portion" claimed by them was, as regards quantity, one half. As regards quality, they alleged that this portion was to be "free," or "cleared" from debts and legacies, which in that case would be thrown upon the other half of the inheritance. It will be seen that by this construction the participle "cleared" was made to depend upon the more remote substantive "portion," instead of upon the nearer one "inheritance." It was contended on the other side that the "inheritance" was to be "cleared" of debts and legacies by paying them out of it, and then the claimants would take a moiety of the residue; and as Lord Shrewsbury had given away his whole estate, there was no residue, and therefore the claimants could take nothing. This was, in effect, contending that the participle "cleared" belonged to the nearer substantive "inheritance." Upon this question of construction, which was the principal question in the cause, the Vice-Chancellor decided against the plaintiff. He held that Lord Shrewsbury had retained full disposing power over his entire property; and as he had disposed of the whole of it, there remained nothing upon which the clause could operate, and therefore he dismissed the bill.

We think the plaintiff relied upon a forced and the defendants upon the plain construction of this clause. But upon a number of subsidiary and artificial arguments of the defendants, the Vice-Chancellor chiefly rested upon the testimony of their own witnesses to decide against them. Thus it was alleged that the fifth clause constituted a pactum successorium, or agreement concerning the succession of a living man, which is forbidden by the Roman law on the very unsatisfactory ground that it is contra bonos mores, as causing the heir to desire the death of the person who created him. Modern Roman lawyers appear to feel the absurdity of this rule, whose existence they nevertheless admit, and they endeavour to limit its operation by numerous and refined distinctions. Thus in the present case the plaintiff's witnesses contended that the clause in question did not give a right to a quota of succession, but only to a quota of property. One of the defendants' witnesses called this distinction "the algebra and metaphysics of jurisprudence, and an invention of lawyers for the purpose of eluding the law." Nevertheless, the distinction seems established—at least if it be possible in any particular case to draw it. The whole or a portion of an inheritance, as inheritance, cannot be taken by a compact inter vivos; but the word credita may possibly appear from the context to mean only property—it may stand for bona mobilia et immobilia, just as those words may, under certain circumstances, be equivalent to the universum jus. All this, it must be owned, is a very pretty exercise of ingenuity, but it would be highly unsatisfactory to see the judgment of an English court rested upon such a slender ground. As the Vice-Chancellor remarked, the Italian cases on this head run very fine. He founded his own decision against the defendants' allegation of pactum successorium upon the doctrine derived from their own witnesses, that such a pact must depend for its effect upon the heir surviving the person who created him; whereas here the assignment was to take effect immediately, and besides, it was made "by title of dowry," or, as we should say, for the valuable consideration of marriage, and therefore the daughter would not take as heir, but as a creditor against the heir.

Upon this point, then, the defendants failed, and they were equally unsuccessful with the arguments which they founded upon a clause of the solemn public instrument, called from its two first words the viene consacrato clause, and of which the translation was as follows:—

The right of jointly succeeding to the inheritance of her father, according to the common law, is by express provision reserved to the said future bride.

It will be seen that this clause was much less favorable to the plaintiff's claim than that contained in the preliminary contract. Indeed it left Lord Shrewsbury quite at liberty to burden his succession with debts and legacies, or to give away the whole of it, as he did, to strangers. The defendants struggled hard to show that this clause must be taken in substitution for what we shall call for the sake of brevity the fifth clause. Here was an informal contract, and a subsequent solemn instrument. Was it not reasonable to suppose that the parties, on deliberation and under advice, had embodied the whole of their mature intentions in the instrument of later date? But one objection to this view was that Lady Gwendaline, a minor, had acquired a present right under the fifth clause, and the proper formalities had not been observed to make her renunciation of that right valid. And, moreover, it was clear upon Italian law that the mere execution of the formal instrument would not abrogate the preliminary contract. There could be no revocation except by incompatibility, and here the two clauses might well stand together. There were also authorities to show that even if the two clauses were inconsistent, the former and not the latter must prevail.

Whatever may be the practical effect of the Roman law upon the condition of the people subject to it, one cannot but feel strongly impressed by the majestic antiquity of a system which seeks the origin of its principles in the remote ages of the free republic which preceded the empire of the Cæsars. We have spoken before of the illegality of a pactum successorium, and of the artificial reasons given for that rule of law. But in his "Opinion for the truth," produced in support of the plaintiff's case, the advocate Rossi showed that this rule was founded on the early practice, according to which an heir could only be created by a lex passed by the Roman people in their comitia. Inheritances were, by the law itself, transferred to the nearest relations of the deceased, and the ancient Romans held that it was lawful for no man to derogate by his own will from such a prescription of the law, and to institute to himself a different heir. When therefore any one wished to do so, he must get a law passed for the express purpose. Upon this ground compacts concerning succession were held to be unlawful and void. Our own reverence for tradition will fit us to appreciate a legal system so much more ancient than our own; and we find that the grandeur of the Roman law is well supported by its practitioners at least in their deliberate compositions. Under the pressure of an English cross-examination, it must be owned that they rather compromised their dignity. But in their written opinions and in their deeds they maintain a sufficiently elevated style. "The aggregate of all virtues which can illustrate a noble young lady," induced a certain Prince to request that she might be given in marriage to his first-born son, "a young man equally adorned with the highest qualities." This is the recital of the settlement made "with the Divine will," and "under the Pontificate of our Lord Pope Pius IX. happily reigning," on the marriage of the Princess Agnese Borghese with the Duc di Sora. If space permitted, we could collect many other interesting examples of a style of thought and of expression which contrast most vividly with those of English lawyers.

This Act has been discussed under a variety of aspects. At one time the soundness of the principle of making powers and provisions incident to estates has been questioned, on the ground that a mortgage in its equitable bearing is a matter of special contract between the parties, while the similarity of any number of private transactions does not invest them with such a character as to bring them within the scope of public legislation. At another time the statutory development of deeds has been objected to, as interfering with the liberty of persons who may make dispositions in ignorance of an officious law. Again, the perplexity of construing the clauses of an instrument together with the clauses of an Act of Parliament has been balanced against any advantage of the brevity of form resulting from the operation of the Act. The general inconvenience too of a mortgagee being obliged to look into the statute book, consolidated or unconsolidated, for what he is allowed to do, and what not to do under his security, tends, it is argued, to complicate business, and so to counteract any convenience of an imperfect, however simple, document in the mortgagee's hands. But grant the principle of making powers incident to estates, admit that there is no undue interference with conveyancing liberty, tolerate the perplexity, and decide in favour of the convenience, yet, there remains the paramount consideration—has the legislative measure been put into a shape suitable for the accomplishment of the object which it professedly has in view? Has Parliament, in its office of draftsman, adequately provided for the circumstances of the matter? Is the shortness of the six clauses—the 11th to the 16th—which regulate sales by mortgagees of real property in their wide diversity, due to a breadth and comprehensiveness, which adapt themselves to the manifold requirements of business; or is this shortness a meagreness owing to narrow views, which cannot contemplate anything beyond the plainest case of mortgage? Is it grasp of subject or ignorance of detail that really characterises this Act?

There is an imposing generality in the preamble:—"It is expedient that certain powers and provisions which it is now usual to insert in mortgages, &c., should be made incident to the estates of the persons interested so as to dispense with the necessity of inserting the same in terms in every such instrument." This is doubtless the magic statutory formula. Parliament need only declare that this or that thing is "expedient," and unfold a dozen or half-dozen clauses, and it is assumed that the thing is done. Since the passing of this Act, the practical question asked hitherto has been, shall we or shall we not exclude its operation from our deeds? If we do not, then according to the prevailing impression, the statutory provisions will fasten themselves inextricably among the common forms of the instrument with such variations and limitations as in the opinion of each cunning interpreter the forms may work in the provisions when applied to the particular case. The acceptance or rejection of the parliamentary conveyancing boon is regarded as optional. The self-imposed limits of its operation have not been at once perceived. We are not now referring to patent restrictions, as that

(s. 11) the purview of this part of the Act is confined to principal money secured or charged by deed on hereditaments of any tenure, and (s. 24) to money advanced or to be advanced by way of loan, or an existing or future debt, and further (s. 32) that the Act does not empower persons to affect the rights of any one, further than they might have affected such rights, if the instrument had contained express powers for such persons to affect such rights.

The self-imposed limits to the application of the mortgage clauses arise mainly out of the 15th section. "The person exercising the power of sale hereby conferred shall have power by deed to convey, or assign to, and vest in the purchaser the property sold, for all the estate and interest therein which the person who created the charge had power to dispose of, except that in the case of copyhold hereditaments the beneficial interest only shall be conveyed to and vested in the purchaser by such deed."

"Had" seems to be a kind of aorist—a tense which has its legitimate uses, but which was not previously naturalised in an Act of Parliament. Let us try back for the meaning of this aorist. Various periods are mentioned in the preceding clauses. There is the period of making the security, the period when the principal shall have become payable, the period of one year after that period, or of six months' arrear of interest, or of failure to pay an insurance premium, the period of sale, and the period of six months' notice before exercising the power of sale. We will suppose, on the principle of qui prior est tempore, &c., that the first of these periods is meant. Then, it is plain that the Act cannot be intended to apply to any case of a mortgage of less than the mortgagor's whole estate and interest, and the whole estate and interest of which he had power to dispose. Otherwise, it would be absurd that the mortgagee should have power to convey for all such estate and interest. Hence, not only are securities made by limited derivative interests out of the mortgagor's estate excluded, but those created under powers; as by a tenant for life, to raise portions or to pay debts, or by trustees for the exoneration of estates, or other usual purposes. No mortgage made under a mere power to dispose in mortgage can be within the 15th section, or consequently within the Act.

Of a similarly restrictive character is the 14th section, enacting that, upon a sale, the residue of the purchase-money shall be paid to the person entitled to the property subject to the charge—a provision wholly unsuitable to any case of divided ownership in the equity of redemption, whether by settlement or otherwise.

Even in the case of a mortgage, which is within the Act, the application of the 15th section suggests a serious inquiry. Hitherto a conveyance on a sale by a mortgagee has operated to pass his estate at law, freed from all right of redemption in equity. But a conveyance made under the Act is to convey for the estate and interest of the mortgagor. Is the purchaser, therefore, to take as for the estate and interest which the mortgagor had at the time of the mortgage, and not for the estate and interest which the mortgagee has at the time of the conveyance? Thus, suppose the case of a mortgagee who, taking without notice of judgments against the mortgagor, has escaped the effects of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; a purchaser from such a mortgagee in the ordinary way would not be affected by such judgments, although the purchaser had notice of them. Will he be affected by them, if under this Act, he takes for such estate and interest as the mortgagor had at the time of the mortgage? The test supplied by the Act itself is, that the rights of other persons (judgment creditors, for instance) shall be affected only to the extent to which they might be affected if the powers had been given in the instrument. We must, therefore, construe the effect of the statutory conveyance in the same manner as we should that of the ordinary conveyance by a mortgagee, if the mortgage had given him power in a sale to vest the property in a purchaser for all the estate and interest therein, which the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage had power to dispose of. What would be the operation of such a power given in a mortgage? Would it throw a purchaser from the mortgagee back upon the mortgagor's title at the time of the mortgage? Can any one safely affirm that it would not? This extraordinary 15th clause has gone so far out of its way, and introduced such a novel treatment of the relations between the mortgagor, mortgagee, and purchaser, in the vital point of the conveyance, that it holds out to a cautious practitioner something like a noli me tangere.

There are other points in the mortgage clauses that are noticeable, as rendering necessary great caution, if not raising great doubt. The Act purports to dispense with the necessity of inserting the usual powers and provisions in terms in every mortgage. It might thus be mistaken for a kind of Mortgage Clauses Consolidation Act, and the mortgagee be regarded as occupying under the Act the same position as if the common-form powers and provisions had been actually inserted in the deed; but this is a theory which must not be trusted before examination of it with the clauses. Turning to the 13th, a sale is not to be made until after notice; "but when a sale has been effected in professed exercise of the powers hereby conferred, the title of the purchaser shall not be liable to be impeached on the ground that no case had arisen to authorise the exercise of such power, or that no such notice as aforesaid had been given; but any person damnified by any such unauthorised exercise of such power shall have his remedy in damages against the person selling." The corresponding proviso in the common form of a power of sale is to the effect, that upon any sale purporting to be made in pursuance of the power, the purchaser shall not be bound to see or inquire whether notice has been given or default made, or as to the expediency of the conditions of sale or otherwise as to the propriety or regularity of the sale, and that notwithstanding any irregularity or impropriety, the sale shall be valid as regards the purchaser. These powers of the Act and of the common form differ in two important particulars. The common form contemplates irregularity or impropriety by the vendor, and relieves the purchaser from being bound to see or inquire respecting any and from the consequences of not seeing or inquiring. The Act is more general, and would save the purchaser's title, although both he and the mortgagee were aware that no case had arisen to authorise a sale, or that no notice had been given. Again, while the 13th section is chargeable with this undue licence, it does not give sufficient licence respecting the grounds of irregularity, confining them as it does to the circumstances of no case arising for sale, and of want of notice. Consequently, the object of the common form, that no irregularity or impropriety as between the mortgagee and mortgagor shall vitiate the sale as respects the purchaser, is not secured by the statutory power.

In applying the 13th section practitioners have also to consider, what is the precise force of the words "in professed exercise of the powers hereby conferred." Thus, if a mortgagee put up the property to sale by auction in the ordinary way, as a sale by a mortgagee, and the usual contract were entered into at the foot of the particulars, it is apprehended that the mortgagee could not afterwards, in carrying out the contract, insist upon the benefit of the indemnity afforded by the Act to the purchaser's title. The sale must at the outset, in the particulars of sale, profess to be made in pursuance of the Act. The same remark applies to a sale by private contract. As regards a subsequent purchaser, however, it will have been sufficient to notice the Act in the conveyance from the mortgagee. The necessity of making the sale from the first professedly under the Act is peculiarly apparent in the case of a subsale by the purchaser.

Some curious cross purposes in practice will result from the provisions of the 11th section, conferring the power of sale, taken in connection with the 12th, providing a discharge to purchasers. By the former section, the person to whom the money "shall for the time being be secured, his executors, administrators, and assigns," shall have power to sell. By the latter section receipts for purchase-money given by the "person or persons exercising the power of sale," shall discharge purchasers. So that if a mortgagee die, and his executor, who is the person to whom the money will for the time being be payable, commences a statutory sale and dies intestate, his "administrator" will be the statutory party to continue the exercise of the power, and therefore to give receipts to purchasers; while the mortgagee's executor will now be the person entitled to the money.

Some experienced conveyancers are, we know, declining the Act. It is scarcely necessary to remind any of our readers that, unless expressly excluded, it takes effect upon a deed. We feel bound, therefore, not to close these remarks without a form of proviso that will be useful for the avoidance of doubts and difficulties, until an amendment or substituted measure shall have been passed, or until judicial decision, obtained by and at the cost of those who may offer themselves as patriotic scapegoats for legislative sins, shall have come in aid to resettle the Act. The proviso is framed on the language of the 32nd section:—

"Provided always, and it is hereby declared, that none of the powers or incidents by the Act to give to trustees, mortgagees, and others, certain powers now commonly inserted in settlements, mortgages, and wills, conferred or annexed to particular offices, estates, or circumstances, shall take effect, or be exercisable in, or in respect of any offices, estates, circumstances, matters, or things created by, or arising under, these presents."

VICE-CHANCELLORS' COURT.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. Wood.)

Nov. 12.—Waller v. Holmes.—This was a petition of the defendant for the delivery by a London firm of solicitors to the petitioner of all deeds and documents, &c., in their custody belonging to him.

The petitioner had employed Mr. Sims, a country solicitor, to act for him in the suit. An order was made in December, 1855, for production by the defendant of all documents, &c., relating to the matters in question in the suit, at the office of Messrs. Mead & Daubeny, the London agents of Sims. Sims died in 1859, and, after settling off the amount of his bills of costs in Waller v. Holmes, his estate still remained largely indebted to the petitioner for moneys advanced. Sims also died indebted to his London agents, Mead & Daubeny, to the amount of £600. The proportion of their claim which had arisen in Waller v. Holmes amounted to £142, and until satisfaction of their lien for this sum they refused to deliver up to the petitioner his deeds.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the deeds must be delivered up to the petitioner. The country solicitor could confer no higher right upon his London agent than he possessed himself. The London agent was always taken as giving credit to the country solicitor, and not to the client himself, of whom he knew nothing. In the present case there was nothing due from the client to the country solicitor, and the result was that there was no such right of lien in the London agents as had been contended for by them. The deeds were ordered to be delivered up, and the respondents to pay the costs of the petitioner.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH,

(Sittings in Banco before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, and Justices WIGHTMAN, HILL, and BLACKBURN.)

Nov. 7.—Fox v. Williams.—This was an application for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict found in his favour, with £200 damages, should not be set aside, and a new trial granted, upon the ground of misdirection and that the damages were excessive. It appeared the plaintiff, Charles Burton Fox, was a solicitor, carrying on business at Newport, in Monmouthshire, in partnership with a Mr. Prothero. The defendant was the printer and publisher of the Star of Gwent, a newspaper circulating in the same county, and the action was brought against him to recover damages for two libels published by him in the Star of Gwent on the 18th of February, 1860. At the trial, which took place at Hereford, at the last assizes, before Mr. Justice Byles and a special jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict with £200 damages. It appeared that the plaintiff was clerk to the Newport justices, and his partner, Mr. Prothero, was clerk of the peace of the county. The 102nd sect. of the Municipal Corporations Act (the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) enacted that the clerk to the justices should not be interested, directly or indirectly, in the prosecution of offenders committed by the borough justices; and as the plaintiff was in partnership with Mr. Prothero, and so shared in the fees which that gentleman received as clerk of the peace on the trial of prisoners committed by the Newport justices, it was objected to the plaintiff that he had an indirect interest in advising the Newport justices to commit offenders for trial. This led to various legal proceedings, which ended in a decision of a court of error that the plaintiff had acted illegally, and a nominal fine of one shilling was imposed upon him. The plaintiff and his partner then, under the advice of counsel, executed a deed, under which it was arranged that in future each party should receive his own fees to his own use, and that they should no longer share in each other's fees. This deed had been denounced in terms which it was admitted could not be justified, and which cast an imputation on the honour of the plaintiff; but it was contended that, notwithstanding the deed, the plaintiff was still interested, by his partner, in the prosecution of offenders committed by the borough justices, and it was submitted that, at all events, the damages were excessive.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said the Court would communicate with Mr. Justice Byles on the subject; and, at a later period of the day, his lordship said the Court had ascertained that Mr. Justice Byles was not dissatisfied with the amount of damages. It was admitted that the libel went beyond fair comment, and described the arrangement in question as merely colourable. It made a charge on the personal honour of the plaintiff, and, therefore, it was competent for the jury to give the plaintiff substantial damages. The learned judge was not dissatisfied with the amount of the damages, and, therefore, he (Lord Chief Justice Cockburn) thought the verdict ought not to be disturbed. With respect to the other point, his lordship thought there had been no misdirection. The plaintiff had now no interest, at least no pecuniary interest, in the prosecutions; his only interest was that which a man might take in advancing the interest of his friend. But that was not the sort of interest which the Act contemplated. It might be that the arrangement was open to some observations, but not to the comments which had been made upon it.

The other judges were of the same opinion.

Rule refused.

(Sittings in Banco, before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN and Justices WIGHTMAN, HILL, and BLACKBURN.)

Nov. 8.—Ex parte the Mayor of Birmingham.—The Solicitor-General moved, on the part of the Mayor of Birmingham, for a rule calling upon the justices of the borough to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them to allow the mayor to take precedence and to preside as chairman at all meetings of the justices where a chairman should be required. The application was made on the part of Thomas Lloyd, the mayor for the year 1859-60, and was founded on the 57th section of the Municipal Corporations Act (the 5th & 6th Will. 4, c. 76), which enacted that the mayor for the time being of every borough shall be a justice of the peace for such borough, and continue so for one year after he shall cease to be mayor; and that "such mayor shall (during the time of his mayoralty) have precedence in all places within the borough." The magistrates had put a construction upon the statute that it did not apply to meetings of magistrates, but was only intended to give the mayor social precedence in the borough; but the Solicitor-General contended that that was not the true construction, but it was intended that the mayor, being a justice virtute officii, should preside at all meetings of the justices where a chairman should be required.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said he thought the right construction had been put on the statute, and that it referred only to social precedence, and did not give the mayor a right to preside at magistrates' meetings.

Rule refused.

Nov. 12.—In re —, an Attorney.—This was an application for a rule calling upon an attorney to show cause why he should not answer the matters of an affidavit and pay over to the applicant a sum of money. It appeared that a few years since the applicant left England for the Cape of Good Hope, and gave the attorney a power of attorney to conduct his business for him in his absence. A sum of £600 was owing to the applicant, and the attorney was advised to get it in and invest it on mortgage. The money was accordingly got in, and the attorney stated he had invested it. The applicant afterwards sent the attorney £150 to be invested, and on his return to England in 1859, required an account of the investments; but not being able to obtain any account, demanded payment of the money. The money not having been paid, the matter was placed in the hands of the applicant's present attorney, whereupon the former attorney rendered an account in which he had debited himself with a loan of £600 at £2 per Cent., but which he had afterwards raised to £5 per Cent.; but this was done without any communication with the applicant. The Court granted a rule.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Nov. 12-13.—Lewis v. The Mayor and Corporation of Rochester.—This was an action by the plaintiff, formerly town-clerk of Rochester, against the corporation, on their retainer to him to oppose an application for a mandamus directed to the Mayor of Rochester, to compel him to revise the list of burgesses for three of the six parishes into which Rochester is divided, which had not been revised owing to a list of the burgesses in those parishes by mistake not having been published according to the requirements of the Municipal Corporation Act; and the question raised by the case was, whether the plaintiff could maintain his action on this retainer under the common seal of the corporation for his bills of costs.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

(Before Sir C. CRESSWELL.)

Nov. 9, 10.—Shedden v. Shedden.—The proceedings in this Court on Friday and Saturday, the 9th and 10th instant, were of unusual interest, from the fact that a lady, whose counsel had withdrawn from the case in consequence of not having had time to master its very numerous and complicated details, came forward herself, and addressed the Court in a speech that would have done credit to a practised barrister. At the sitting of the Court, on Friday, Mr. Macaulay, Q.C., applied for an adjournment, on the ground that neither he nor Sir Hugh Cairns (who was with him) had been enabled to give that attention to the papers which the complicated and very peculiar nature of the case required. Sir C. Cresswell, however, stated that before the long vacation he had given notice that this case would be the first that would be taken this term. Great public inconvenience would arise if it were postponed. It must therefore go on. Mr. Macaulay regretted to say that, under the circumstances, it must go on without the aid of himself and his learned friends. He and his colleagues then withdrew. Miss Shedden accordingly stood forward, and in a very lengthened, but exceedingly lucid, and even eloquent speech, stated the case in support of the petition. She felt that some prejudice might arise against her for having thus come forward; and an apprehension might be entertained lest, in an age when so much was said of woman's rights, other ladies might be induced by her example to plead their causes in person. She continued to address the Court until it rose. On Saturday, when the case was resumed, Miss Shedden stated that Sir H. Cairns and Mr. Macaulay would be ready to proceed with the argument in her behalf on Thursday; and asked for an adjournment till then. The Court declined to accede to the application. The Attorney-General (who had been cited to watch the proceedings) was ready to assent to the application. Sir C. Crosswell had no objection to postpone the legal argument, provided that the rest of the case were proceeded with, so that no time might be lost. After some further discussion, Miss Shedden stated she was unable at once to proceed with her case. At that moment she felt as if she could hardly speak—not that she felt physically weak, but she feared that if she attempted to go on, her brain would hardly stand it. Mr. Macaulay was then confined to his room, and Sir H. Cairns (whose kindness and the kindness of whose family she could never forget) had an engagement in the Vice-Chancellor Wood's Court, and could not be present. Sir Hugh had told her that he should never think without pain and distress on the state in which he had been obliged to leave the case. (Here Miss Shedden, who is a person of very ladylike demeanour, exhibited some emotion, her voice faltered, and she abruptly concluded). She spoke on Saturday for nearly five hours.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.

The late Alderman Wire.—At a Court held on the 13th inst., at which the Lord Mayor presided, Mr. Alderman Copeland said it had pleased God to deprive them of one of their number, the late Mr Wire, who for a long period of years was known to the corporation of London, and who as a magistrate discharged the duties of his office with great zeal and fidelity. He felt sure that the Court would pay that tribute of respect to his memory, and offer that condolence and sympathy to his widow and family, which were due at their hands. As a corporator, as under-sheriff, as sheriff, and as Lord Mayor of the city, he had known Mr. Wire, and certainly he deserved credit at the hands of the Court for the manner in which he invariably discharged his duties. He moved a resolution expressive of regret on the part of the Court at the death of their esteemed and estimable colleague, and of their appreciation of his public services, and directing that a vote of condolence be prepared and presented to his widow and family. Sir P. Laurie, in seconding the motion, said he had great respect for Mr. Alderman Wire, for he always thought him a most honourable man. The motion was carried unanimously.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

At a court holden on the 15th inst., Dr. Abraham moved that it be referred to the Law, Parliamentary, and City Courts Committee to consider the expediency and propriety, and also the terms, of including the City Commission of Sewers in the arrangements provided for performing the legal business of the corporation, in order to relieve the ratepayers of the city from the expense of employing separate Parliamentary and other law officers to perform the legal business of the commission, and to report thereon forthwith to the Court. He submitted that, as the Commissioners of Sewers were appointed by that Court, and almost all of them were members of the Council, the Commission was to a certain extent a branch of the corporation. The Commission expended about £15,000 a year in public works and improvements, scarcely one of which could be carried out without the intervention of a lawyer. Its average annual law expenses during the last five years had amounted to £780, and its Parliamentary expenses to £718. He thought an arrangement might be made that would add little to the present expenses of the corporation, and might materially lessen those of the Commission.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERKENWELL POLICE COURT.

Nov. 12.—Henry Augustus Meech, formerly clerk to Messrs Gregory & Co., Solicitors, Bedford-row, was charged with stealing the sum of £140, the property of that firm. It appeared that in July, 1859, Mr. Gregory gave the prisoner a cheque for £120 to pay for probate duty. Shortly afterwards Meech absconded, without having appropriated the money to the purpose for which it was intended. Nothing further was seen of him till the 9th instant, when he was observed by Mr. Fraser, a clerk in the prosecutors' employ, and was given into custody. It also appeared that when the prisoner absconded, he took with him a cash book in which he entered the fees paid to counsel, and that several sums he had received for that purpose had not been paid by him, and the prosecutors had to draw cheques a second time to pay those fees. The prisoner was committed for trial, but bail was taken for his appearance, himself in £400, and two sureties in £200 each.

SOUTHWARK POLICE COURT.

Nov. 10.—One of the toll-collectors at Waterloo-bridge was summoned by Mr. Frederick Payne Puckle, a member of the London Scottish Volunteers, for unlawfully demanding and taking the toll while he was going to the place appointed for drill, dressed in his uniform, according to the regulations, &c.,

It appeared that the head-quarters of the corps were at Adelphi-terrace, and that they drilled at Westminster-hall. Mr. Puckle resided at Camberwell, and on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd instant, left home for the purpose of going to drill. He was dressed in his usual uniform, and as he was about to pass through the toll-gate at Waterloo-bridge, the defendant demanded the toll. He claimed exemption, as he was on duty, but the defendant insisted upon being paid, consequently he handed him the money, under protest.

The complainant was at the time without his arms or accoutrements, the regulations of the corps being that the members of the corps should go to head-quarters to fetch their arms and accoutrements for drill, and leave them there after drill. It was contended on the part of the bridge company, that as Mr. Puckle was in simple uniform, he could not claim exemption. The magistrate, however, thought a sufficient reason had been given for the complainant being without his side-arms, and gave judgment accordingly, but did not inflict a penalty, merely ordering the defendant to pay costs.

The following solicitors were elected mayors of the undermentioned municipal boroughs on the 9th instant:—

Mr. Thomas Crawhall Alcock.....	Sunderland.
Edmond Foster	Cambridge.
Charles Bettesworth Hellard...	Portsmouth.
Henry Ingledew.....	Newcastle-on-Tyne.
Lewis Whincop Jarvis	Lynn.
Samuel George Johnson	Faversham.
George Leeman	York.
Gillett Jonathan Ottaway.....	Salisbury.
Cadwallader Edmonds Palmer	Barnstaple.
John Pearson.....	Doncaster.
Arthur Ryland	Birmingham.
Joseph Shipton	Chesterfield.
Charles Woolridge.....	Winchester.

Mr. Merivale, the Under Secretary of State for India, has appointed Mr. Charles Chicheley Plowden to be his private secretary in the place of Mr. Hobhouse, who has been promoted.

The Hon. Society of Gray's-inn have appointed the Rev. W. Henry Hart, M.A., Demy of Magdalen College, Oxford, and officiating Curate of St. Luke's, Chelsea, Reader and Afternoon Preacher of the Society.

EQUITY.

PRACTICE—ENFORCING COMPROMISE BY PETITION.

Dawson v. Newsome, 8 W. R., V.C.S., 725.

Since the Chancery Amendment Act of 1852, the tendency of the practice of courts of equity is towards the substitution of petitions and summary applications for the more formal procedure of regular suits; and this case is useful as shewing that the Court will not be averse to decide upon petition such an agreement for the compromise of a suit as before the Act of 1852 would have required the institution of a suit by bill. In Richardson v. Eyton, 2 De G. M. & G., 79, the Lords Justices considered that they could not give effect to an agreement for the compromise of a suit by a petition in that suit, and that a new suit, one in fact for the specific performance of the agreement, was rightly instituted. Sir John Leach, also in Forsyth v. Manton, 5 Madd. 78, was of opinion that the Court had no jurisdiction to enforce an agreement which was no part of the suit, but had been privately come to by the parties out of Court. The principal case, previous to the Act of 1852, upon this point of practice is Askew v. Millington, 9 Hare 65, in which Turner, V.C., upon a petition to enforce an agreement entered into by the parties to the cause after it was at issue, for the compromise of the suit, refused to dismiss the bill or to stay proceedings. The ground of this decision also was that the petition sought in fact the specific performance of an agreement—which according to the practice of the Court could only be decreed in a regular suit. “On principle, I think,” said the learned judge, that the proceeding by bill is more correct; for it is obvious that the Court, in trying such matters upon an interlocutory application in the original suit, is called upon to adjudicate on affidavit upon matters depending on equities wholly distinct from the equity appearing upon record in the cause.” In Dawson v. Newsome, however, Stuart, V.C., said, “that whenever under the present fortunately improved practice an agreement for the compromise of a suit was entered into and a petition presented in order to carry that agreement into effect in the most speedy and least expensive way, he should think it his duty to use every means in his power to make that agreement effective, when consistently with the rights of third parties the matters in question might be safely disposed of in that way.” Under the modern practice, as the Vice Chancellor pointed out in his judgment in this case, if the petitioner were refused relief upon the ground that he had adopted a wrong mode of procedure, he would have nothing to do but to alter the form of the petition into that of a bill, and give notice of motion for a decree, which he might obtain upon precisely the same evidence as had proved insufficient upon the petition. This would be an obvious absurdity under the new system of practice inaugurated in 1852. It must not be forgotten, however, that even now it would be dangerous to attempt to enforce by petition an agreement for the compromise of a suit where the agreement for the compromise itself involves new matter, or the interests of any persons who are not parties to the suit, and, perhaps, it might also be added where the agreement itself—ex. gr. as to the manner in which it was obtained, ignorance of a compromising party as to his rights, &c.—would appear properly to form a distinct matter of litigation. But after the case of Dawson v. Newsome, and the observations of Vice Chancellor Stuart, in delivering judgment, there can be little risk for the future, where there is a plain and unquestionable agreement for compromising a suit which has been fairly entered into between the parties, and which does not involve the rights and obligations of third persons, in resorting to the summary expedient of a petition rather than to the slower process of a bill, for the enforcement of the agreement.

COMMON LAW.

ATTORNEY—AFFIDAVIT OF INCREASE—COSTS OF WITNESSES.

Cross v. Durell, 8 W. R., Ex., 630.

This was an application to the Court to order a review of the taxation of the costs which the unsuccessful party had to pay to the other, on the ground that in the affidavit of increase certain of the successful party's witnesses had been alleged to have been paid prior to taxation, whereas at the date thereof such witnesses had not in fact been paid. It appeared that the mistake had probably been made without any corrupt intention on the part of the attorney in the cause, as he had handed to his client a list of the witnesses and the amount due to each, and had received back from him what purported to be receipts from the respective witnesses; and it was alleged that it was on the faith of this representation that the attorney made the affidavit. The Court said that the rule which confines the allowances for witnesses to the expenses actually paid before taxation, was of great importance and must be rigidly enforced. They therefore made absolute the rule for a review of taxation, and in so doing followed the precedent of the Queen's Bench, in the case of Trent v. Harrison (2 D. & L. 941).

It should be noticed that in cases of this kind in which the courts have any reason to suppose that the affidavit of increase was wilfully, or even grossly carelessly missworn, very severe language is used. In a recent case the Court of Queen's Bench suspended from practice an attorney who had so misconducted himself; and Lord Campbell took occasion to say:—

“The charge of fraud is answered; therefore the party will not be struck off the roll. But his conduct has been highly reprehensible in swearing that he had paid money when he had only advanced it for the purpose of being paid, or when at the time of swearing he had only promised it. The practice in swearing these affidavits of increase has often been censured as lax, but has not been reformed” (Re Flewker, cited in Doe d. Mence v. Hadley, 17 Q. B. 572).

TORT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—MALICE.

Emblin v. Myers, 8 W. R., Exch., 665.

It was mentioned last week that in case of a bare tort, the actual loss sustained was often, and indeed generally, the true measure of damages; but where the injury is wilful and malicious, this is otherwise. Of the latter branch of this proposition, the present case is an apt illustration. It was an action for pulling down a wall of the defendant in such a negligent way as to injure some of the plaintiff's property; and at the trial words of the defendant were given in evidence, which showed not only that ill will existed between him and the plaintiff (who was his next neighbour), but that he had contemplated and been desirous that the plaintiff's property should be injured by the removing of the wall, in the manner which ultimately turned out to be the case. Under these circumstances, the judge told the jury that they might, in estimating the damage, take into account the malicious animus of the defendant; which they accordingly did, giving a sum of money considerably beyond the actual value of the property injured. It was urged, in seeking to set aside this verdict on the ground of misdirection, that though malice might properly aggravate the damages in actions in which it would be implied by law (such as for a false imprisonment and the like), the same rule did not arise in actions in which (as in the present) it was the province of the jury to decide whether, under the particular circumstances, malice did or did not exist. The Court, however, held that no such distinction existed; but that in every case the jury might properly take the whole of the circumstances under consideration: and if they thought the defendant had been recklessly or maliciously disregarding of the safety of the plaintiff or his property, might give damages with a liberal hand. In the words of Bramwell, B., “there is no reason why the principle of malice being an element in assessing damages, should be limited to actions of trespass and should not extend to actions of negligence.”

PRACTICE—NOTICES MUST BE IN WRITING.

Woodward v. North, 8 W. R., Exch., 694.

This case supplies a direct authority (though perhaps one is hardly required) for the practice which makes it proper and indeed necessary that every notice from one party in an action to another, which authorises any subsequent step, should be in writing. With respect, indeed, to such notices as are required by any general rule or by the practice of the Court, there is an express rule of Court to this effect—namely, Reg. Gen. H. T. 1833, Pr. r. 161. But the same necessity exists where a notice is not required to be given, but may be given by one party to the other; as where under Reg. Gen. E. T. 1857, the defendant by giving notice that he intends to oppose an application by the plaintiff for costs in actions of contract under £20, in which judgment has been suffered in default—prevents an order for costs being obtained by the plaintiff ex parte. The Court held that the rule of H. T. 1853 was a very valuable one, and operated to prevent perjury; and that the subsequent rule of E. T. 1857, was a rule of the practice of the Court, and, therefore, within the previous rule.

Correspondence.

LORD CRANWORTH'S TRUSTEES AND MORTGAGEES ACT.

Will you allow me to address you, in few words, on Lord Cranworth's Act? I have seen a proposal to introduce into deeds and wills a clause declaring that the Act shall be wholly inapplicable to them. I cannot think that this suggestion is a wise one, if it be made merely because of an imperfection in some of the clauses, or a worthy one if it be made on the ground of pecuniary interest. The design of the Act is the same as that of the Lands Clauses and Companies Clauses Acts, and the General Enclosure Act, which contain enactments of great length, rendering unnecessary the insertion of similar clauses in each particular Act. Such is the purpose of Lord Cranworth's Act, in its application to deeds and wills. If those who have made the above unfriendly suggestion in regard to Lord Cranworth's Act think any of the clauses imperfect, the proper course is to state their objections with the reasons. It may be that some of the provisions are inapplicable. It so, let us see and distinguish these clauses from the others. The several enactments are independent of each other, and the greater number, at all events, will, I apprehend, be found capable of being universally applied.

Let us look at them in detail.

In the earlier sections, trustees who have a power of sale are authorised to sell in lots, either by auction or private contract, at one time or several times, and under such special conditions as they shall think fit, and to buy in and resell; and those who have power to sell may convey; and persons acting under a power of sale are authorised to lay out the money according to the direction in the instrument, or in land. These things are usually provided for in long clauses—and can any of us deny that it is reasonable that trustees should have these powers without the constant repetition of them?

The Act also contains powers to mortgagees to insure buildings, and charge the premiums, and to appoint or obtain the appointment of a receiver; also a power to trustees to apply the income of infants' shares for their maintenance (without inquiring into the ability of their father or their income from other sources), the receipts of persons authorised to sell, and of trustees generally, are to be sufficient; and executors are to be at liberty to compound and submit to arbitration. These provisions also are of great convenience and importance.

All these provisions are set forth with the same particularity which conveyancers use in deeds and wills, and I am not aware of any imperfection that should prevent their being used. If there be such objection, it would be a service to the profession and the public to point it out.

There are some clauses on which solicitors may pause till they have some further assurance. The power (sect. 8) to renew leaseholds may often be very useful, but it is made compulsory on trustees to renew if any person having a beneficial interest require it, even if other persons interested object, and the settlor or testator has given no direction. This may be too strong. The trustees ought perhaps to have discretion to renew or not, unless called on by all the beneficiaries. If there be this imperfection, it would be sufficient to declare in the deed or will, that the trustees shall have power to renew, but shall not be required to do so unless called on by the person or persons interested for the time being.

Sect. 11 enacts that a mortgagee may sell, after the default specified in the clause, on giving six months' notice to any one of the owners. This hardly seems a sufficient security to other part owners, who may never hear of the notice, and it may admit of collusion. This may be corrected by a statement in the mortgage deed that no sale shall take place without a notice being given to the mortgagor, his heirs or assigns, or affixed, &c.

Also, the powers given by the Act to appoint new trustees would not apply except where the appointment is to be made by the surviving trustees of their own authority alone. It is frequently desired that the appointment should be made by, or with the consent of, some other person. In such a case the clause can be set out in the deed or will, as at present; or it can be said that any appointment shall require the consent of, &c.

Now if it is necessary that in some cases these latter powers should be set out as at present, or that a modification should be expressed as above, this should not in the least lessen the use of the Act in other things; seeing (as I have said) that the clauses are independent of each other, and that some may be used if others are not. If there be other objections let them be stated in detail, that they may be removed. This alone is fair dealing with a measure which is intended to improve the practice of conveyancing. Surely your readers approve of the Lands Clauses Act, and Companies Clauses Act, and General Enclosure Act; yet these three Acts apply to transactions not a hundredth part so numerous as the instruments which may be affected by Lord Cranworth's Act.

Besides that which has been the subject of this letter, (viz., that some of the clauses may be thought to be imperfect or partially inapplicable,) I know but of one objection, it is that the legal profits of conveyancing would be unreasonably lessened. It certainly is very much to be wished that the principle of remuneration were altered; but simplified deeds and wills would be better for our clients, even if they paid the same sums for them as before; and if it be acknowledged that after this Act, long clauses can be left out with perfect safety and even with advantage, can we continue to insert them merely to be enabled to charge for them? And might we not, for the same reason, have gone on preparing assignments of terms and leases for a year, after they had been made unnecessary, or have continued the verbiage which we find in the older deeds, but which has happily passed away and would now be offensive to good taste, good sense, and good conscience?

Let us seek for an alteration in the mode of payment of fees; but meanwhile not do so little justice to ourselves and to our profession (which we would call liberal and honourable), as to prefer prolixity and technicality to simplicity and common sense, and thus fail to co-operate with those who are doing their best to make some improvement in our imperfect human doings.

Bristol, Nov. 12, 1860.

PROOF OF CANCELLATION OF STAMPS ON AGREEMENTS.

I would suggest, with reference to this, that the stamp should be placed at the foot of the agreement, and that the party should sign his name across it, writing the date below. The proof of the agreement would thus be the proof of the cancellation. It must be borne in mind, however, that the stamp must be cancelled by "every party to the agreement who shall sign the same;" therefore, unless the stamps are large enough for all the persons to sign their names across another plan must be adopted.

THE COMMON LAW MASTERS.

Allow me to remove the erroneous impression conveyed to your readers by the letter of a "Common Law Managing Clerk" in your last number, as to the work done by the common law masters. During the vacation, Master Gordon has taxed of a morning from seventy to eighty bills of costs, and when he had finished these, he has taken references in order to expedite justice. He took one for us beginning at two o'clock, when the offices closed, and proceeded with it till five; and this upon several occasions. I think it right that so great an error as that committed by your correspondent should be corrected and forthwith.

A CONSTANT READER.

MUNICIPAL LAW.

In November, 1858, A. B. was elected a town councillor for a borough, being on the burgess list and duly qualified. About twelve months ago he left the borough and went to reside permanently at fifty miles distant therefrom, where he has ever since continued to dwell. Upon leaving the borough, and ceasing to be an occupier of premises therein, his name was erased from the poor's rate, and also from the burgess list. Although he so ceased to be a burgess he has continued to hold the office to the present time, and occasionally (about every two months) comes to the borough, attends the meetings of the council, and takes part in the proceedings, considering he has a right to do so—that the 52nd clause of the Municipal Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76,) applies to his case, and that as he is not absent from the borough for more than six months at a time he is not disqualified from acting; but on the contrary, that in case of his entire absence he would be liable to a fine of £50.

It appears to me that by sect. 28 of the Act, no person is qualified to be elected, or to be a councillor who shall not be entitled to be on the burgess list—and I conceive that sect. 52 does not at all apply to the case, but is applicable only to a person duly qualified, and who neglects his duty by absence.

It is, however, the opinion of some persons that he is qualified and has a right to attend, and act until the expiration of his term of office (three years).—of others, that he is disqualified—which is correct?

A SUBSCRIBER.

SOLICITOR'S LIEN ON FUND IN COURT.

I wish to call your attention to the question which arose in the course of the suit of Grimsby v. Webster (8 W. R., 725) as to the right of a solicitor to a lien of £50 upon a fund in court. It appeared that a tenant for life of a trust fund had induced the trustees to commit a breach of trust, by selling out and handing to him a portion of the fund. This advance was secured by a policy of assurance on his life. The ces-this que trusts in remainder subsequently purchased the interest of the tenant for life for a sum of £200, and debited him with a sum of £50, which he owed to his solicitor for costs and advances. An arrangement was made between the solicitor of the parties, and the solicitor claiming the lien, that the policy should be sold, and the £50 paid out of the proceeds. This arrangement was not, however, carried out, and a bill was ultimately filed on the death of the tenant for life, by some of the parties interested, and the amount of the policy was paid into court. The solicitor claiming the lien, who had no notice of the suit, gave notice of his claim to the several parties, and obtained a stop order on the fund. On the cause coming on to be heard, Kindersley made a declaration in favour of the solicitor's right to the lien, and also gave him the costs of obtaining the stop order. The law of solicitors' lien has not been in a very satisfactory state since the decision of the case of Shaw v. Neale in the House of Lords, in which it was held that a solicitor acquired no right of lien upon real estate for his costs and expenses incurred in recovering an estate. A salutary change in the law, however, has recently been made by the Attorneys and Solicitors Act passed last session. The 28th section of that Act—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127—empowers the court or judge before whom any suit, matter, or proceeding shall be depending, to declare the attorney or solicitor engaged therein entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved; and upon such declaration being made, "such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon and against, and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, &c.; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of, and for raising and payment of, such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property, as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper." This and the preceding section allowing a charge for interest upon costs in certain cases, were very properly introduced into the statute to which reference has been made, as solicitors frequently suffered great injustice from the want of such provisions. The decision in the case of Grimsby v. Webster was decided previously to the passing of the statute, and seems mainly to have proceeded upon the ground that there was an agreement by all the parties that the costs of the solicitors should be paid out of the proceeds of the policy; but the case is of importance as an authority upon the subject of the law of lien in relation to the profession. The Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.—On the 27th of August last, the Council of the Chamber of Commerce for Birmingham and the midland district, presented a memorial to the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, praying for the reduction and revision of certain fees payable on the registration of designs under the Copyright of Designs Acts. The memorial was prepared by Mr. Arthur Ryland, Vice-President of the Chamber. On the 3rd inst., the Council received from Mr. G. A. Hamilton, Secretary to the Lords of the Treasury, the following reply to the memorial:—"Gentlemen, with reference to your memorial of the 27th of last August, praying that the fees now charged for registration of designs, under 5 & 6 Vict. cap. 65 and cap. 100, and subsequent Acts, may be revised with a view to their reduction, and also praying that the fees now charged for the registration of designs for metallic goods may be reduced from £3 to £1, I am desired by the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you that their Lordships have signified to the Board of Trade their approval of the reduction of the fee on metal designs from £3 to £1. I am at the same time to state that there does not appear to their lordships to be sufficient reason to justify the reduction of the fees on the registration of useful designs.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, GEO. A. HAMILTON."

A case, which has excited a good deal of curiosity in various quarters, was heard before Leigh Trafford, Esq., judge of the county court, on the 7th inst. Mr. J. B. Hebert, who is captain of No. 10 Company of the Birmingham Rifle Volunteers, summoned Lieutenant Jeffries, of the same corps, to show cause why he had neglected to pay a sum of £8, as his share of contribution towards the fund for the maintenance of the band belonging to the battalion. When the case was called on it was intimated to the Court that there was an objection to the particulars as set forth upon the face of the summons, and it was contended that according to these there was no ground of action. The judge having examined the plaint, observed that no contract was set forth upon the face of it. The contribution might be, and he supposed was, voluntary. He thought the plaintiff must show upon the face of the summons the contract, and if it was a special contract that should also be stated. Time was given to amend the particulars, and the case adjourned until the 5th December.

BRISTOL.—Bankruptcy Court.—Re T. R. Hutton, late official assignee.—A meeting for hearing claims against the fund derived from the securities of this officer was held on the 7th instant. The following order was drawn up, and signed by Mr. Commissioner Hill:—"This being the day appointed by me for the hearing of applications or objections in reference to the accounts prepared by the late Mr. P. R. Power, of the defalcations of the above-named Thomas Rennie Hutton, the following solicitors, representing various estates included in such account, attended before me—that is to say, Messrs. H. Brittan & Son, by Mr. Henry Brittan; Messrs. Bevan, Girling, & Press, by Mr. Press; Messrs. M. Brittan & Sons, by Mr. Alfred Brittan; Messrs. Whittington & Gribble, by Mr. Gribble; Mr. Wilkes, of Gloucester; Messrs. Bush, Ray, & Co., by Mr. Ray; Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Charles Bevan; and with their assent, I do order that the accounts of the said Mr. Thomas Rennie Hutton with the said several estates be adjusted according to the data furnished by the said Mr. P. R. Power, as contained in the list thereof now signed by me, and that the account of the moneys recovered from the said Mr. Hutton's sureties be audited before me, at a sitting to be held in this court on Friday, the twenty-third day of this instant month of November, to the intent that the net amount of such moneys be divided amongst the said several estates, upon the basis of the before-mentioned account."

FAVERSHAM.—At a meeting of the Town Council on the 9th inst., Mr. Samuel George Johnson, a solicitor of this town, was unanimously re-elected mayor of the borough. At the conclusion of the business of the day, Mr. Alderman Spong, in a highly complimentary speech, on behalf of the council presented Mr. Johnson with a large silver salver, upon which it is intended the following inscription shall be engraved:—"Presented to S. G. Johnson, Esq., on the 9th day of November, A. D. 1860, by Mr. Alderman Spong, on behalf of the council, as a memorial of the honourable manner in which he has filled the office of Mayor of Faversham during the past year."

LIVERPOOL.—The fees of the magistrates' clerks of this borough last year amounted to the sum of £7,197, and after deducting the salaries and other disbursements there was a balance handed over to the borough fund of £4,307.

MANCHESTER.—The Manchester Chamber of Commerce held a meeting on the 14th instant, for the purpose of conferring with Mr. Samuel Morley, of London, and other gentlemen on the prospects of the amendment of the laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. Mr. Edmund Potter, president of the chamber, was in the chair. Mr. Morley stated that unless the mercantile interests took some special steps to be represented as creditors in the House of Commons, they had no chance of obtaining a valuable measure of amendment. The principle upon which they were acting was that the property of an insolvent trader, the instant he was discovered to be insolvent, belonged, not to himself, but to his creditors. He believed, however, that such views did not find utterance in the House of Commons. He stated that Sir Richard Bethell was desirous "to do the bidding" of the mercantile interests, provided he had sufficient information conveyed to him in time for the purpose. He then read a letter which had been written by Sir R. Bethell, and which was as follows:—"London, Oct. 22. Dear Sir,—I am very sorry I shall not be in town after to-day until the 1st November. I am very much disgusted by the absurd accusations brought against me of having abandoned the Bankruptcy Bill through ill-humour. I certainly was treated by the members for places most clamorous for the Bill in a manner to provoke ill-humour, after the labour and sacrifices I had made; but the Bill was given up after the most deliberate consideration with Lord Palmerston, and in consequence of the leading law lords having stated that they certainly would not proceed with it if it came up to them after July; and no human exertion, even with the concessions I made so injuriously, could have got the Bill through the Commons before the 5th or 6th of August. The defeat of the Bill is due to the division on Sir H. Willoughby's motion, when the members for Coventry, Nottingham, Birmingham, and many other large towns voted against me in perfect ignorance of the matter."

That lost me nearly three weeks, and was the real cause, joined to the faint support I received, of the loss of the Bill. I do not think you will find a division list in which half of the members pledged to support the Bill were present. Yours faithfully, RICHARD BETHELL."—Several gentlemen having addressed the meeting, the following resolution was moved and carried unanimously:—"That this Chamber has heard with great satisfaction that her Majesty's Government are pledged to introduce, at the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, a Bill to amend the laws affecting bankruptcy and insolvency, and trusts that they will spare no efforts to secure the enactment of a simple practical measure for that purpose; and further trusts that another Session may not be permitted to pass away without the settlement of a question so important to the interests of this community."

WAKEFIELD.—A special adjourned sessions, at which a considerable number of magistrates of the West Riding attended, was held at the West Riding Court House on the 7th inst., to take into consideration the report of a committee, which had been appointed in April last, to act with the Riding solicitor for the purpose of preparing the draft of a Bill for altering the present expensive mode of election of the registrar of deeds for the West Riding, and for paying all future registrars by salary, and not by fees, and for the better regulation of the office. The committee reported that a Bill for the purpose had been prepared by the Riding solicitor, and that they approved of it. Mr. John Marsden, the solicitor to the magistrates, having read the draft of the Bill, considerable discussion ensued as to the manner in which the expense of obtaining the passing of the Act through Parliament should be provided; and it appearing doubtful whether the expense could be defrayed out of the county rates, or that an attempt to pass such a Bill would meet with success, the consideration of the matter was adjourned sine die. Mr. Dibb (the deputy registrar of the Riding) stated that if power were given to register wills by affidavit it would result in a saving of from £5,000 to £6,000 per annum to the Riding.

Ireland.

The Landlord and Tenant Consolidation Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 154), which became law on the 28th August last, and will come into operation on the 1st January, 1861, is more ambitious in its object than most of the current legislation, for it both consolidates and amends a highly important branch of law. The law of landlord and tenant in Ireland was to be found scattered through forty statutes, and it was a useful work to condense and simplify it, and bring it within the compass of one Act of Parliament; for assuredly there are elements of mischief enough, politically and socially, between landowners and their tenants, without the further difficulties arising from uncertain and diffuse laws. Henceforward the new Act will alone be referred to; and by it the numerous Acts dealing with the same subject are repealed, and cleared out of the way, while it also contains some new and useful clauses tending to relieve the landlord and tenant code of much that was feudal in principle and tortuous and obscure in practice.

The new law as contained in this statute, may be divided into three heads.—(1.) The creation, assignment, and surrender of tenancies. (2.) The rights of landlord and tenant, as incident to the tenancy. (3.) The legal remedies available to the landlord.

(1.) The creation, assignment, and surrender of tenancies.—The relation of landlord and tenant is henceforward to be considered as founded on contract only; and it is not necessary that there should be a reversion in the landlord. All tenancies for more than one year are to be created by writing; and leases and agreements for leases must also be in writing signed by the landlord, or by his agent authorized in writing. (Altering in this respect the law as enacted both by the Statute of Frauds and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.) A tenant continuing to hold the premises after the expiration of his lease, is to be taken to be a yearly tenant at his former rent: but after demand in writing of possession by the landlord or his agent, he will be liable to pay double rent. To avoid disputes as to when tenancies commenced, it is declared that yearly tenancies shall (in the absence of evidence) be presumed to have commenced at the last rent-day of the year.

Surrenders can henceforward only take place by deed or writing signed by the tenant, or by operation of law; so that a verbal agreement to surrender, or the cancelling of a lease, will be insufficient. A lease may be surrendered and a renewal obtained without any surrender of the interests of sub-tenants, and the remedies of the head landlord shall not be affected by such renewal. Assignments of leases, which by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106 must be effected by deed, will now be valid if made either by deed or by note in writing, and if not assigned or otherwise disposed of, a lease shall, on the tenant's death, pass as part of his personal estate to his representatives. Where the lease contains a clause (a frequent one in Ireland) against sub-letting without consent, the landlord's consent by deed or memorandum endorsed shall be requisite to render a sub-lease valid; and the assignee shall be liable to the agreements in respect of sub-letting, &c., as the lessee would be. The covenants, in a lease or contract, are to subsist and remain in force, notwithstanding any devolution of interest from the landlord; and in the same way the benefit of covenants and agreements entered into by the landlord will devolve upon any person upon whom the tenant's interest may legally devolve. No assignee shall be liable in respect of breaches of covenant occurring before the assignment to him, provided that notice in writing of every assignment by a tenant shall have been given to the landlord; and every tenant being an assignee, shall remain liable for the rent due up to the rent day following such notice of assignment. Any landlord assenting to an assignment, shall be deemed to have discharged the original tenant from all actions, &c. Fixtures of trade or agriculture, erected by the tenant, and removable without substantial damage to the premises, may be removed within two months after the tenancy is expired, compensation for damage (if any) being made. In order to obviate disputes as to whether waiver of a covenant has taken place on the part of the landlord, it is enacted that no act of the landlord shall be deemed a dispensation with or waiver of any covenant or condition contained in a lease made after the commencement of the Act, unless the waiver be signified in writing by the landlord or his authorised agent.

(2.) As to the incidents of a tenancy.—In every lease or agreement made after the passing of the Act, shall be implied a covenant by the landlord that he has good title and for quiet enjoyment. Tenants holding perpetual interests under leases made after 1st January, 1861, are not to be impeachable of waste, except so far as expressly restrained from waste. On the other hand, when the lease is for a term of years, or otherwise determinable in its nature, the tenant shall not, without previous consent in writing, open any mines or quarries or commit any kind of waste. But the tenant holding under any such lease may work mines, &c., already opened, unless restrained in terms by the lease; and the tenant may also work any quarries, already opened or worked, for purposes of agriculture or of necessary building, but not for trade or sale, unless the written authority of the landlord be obtained. In the same way the right of turbary may be enjoyed by the tenant, but only for the use of himself and his lawful sub-tenants. Tenants holding under terminable leases are, by other sections, prohibited from "burning" the land, and from cutting down trees and underwoods, under severe penalties, to be recovered by the landlord at quarter sessions. Where unlawful waste or destruction is apprehended, or is being perpetrated, the landlord may, on affidavit, obtain a "precept" from a magistrate, enjoining all persons to desist from such injury, &c., disobedience to which may be punished by a month's imprisonment. An appeal lies to a judge of assize or to quarter sessions, and costs and compensation may be awarded. Where mines, &c., are reserved by the lease, they may be worked or leased by the landlord, who may enter for that purpose, making compensation for any damage inflicted, such compensation to be (if necessary) assessed at quarter sessions. Two important changes in the law relating to the sudden determination of tenancies are as follows:—Where the tenancy ends by the death or cesser of the interest of the landlord, or by a like uncertain event, the tenant may in lieu of claiming his emblements (as formerly allowed by the law), continue to hold the premises until the last rent-day of the current year, paying rent as theretofore. Again, if any house or building, the subject of the lease, as to rebuilding which there is no express covenant, be destroyed or become ruinous, without default of the tenant, he may surrender forthwith, and on payment of rent due, shall be discharged from further obligation as to rent or covenants thenceforward. Every lease to be made after the commencement of the Act, is to imply agreements by the tenant to pay rent, and to keep the premises in repair, and at the end of the term to give up peaceable possession, &c. With regard to the payment of rent, the following alterations in the law are made (by sections 47—51), and thereby are set at rest certain fruitful sources of litigation between landlords and tenants. Every receipt for rent shall specify the day of its falling due, otherwise such rent shall, in any action or proceeding whatsoever, be deemed to have been in payment of rent falling due on the rent day next before the date of the payment, and shall be prima facie evidence of no arrears being due. In paying rent the tenant may set off all just debts due to him by his landlord. In the event of the landlord's death the rent shall in all cases be apportioned; and lastly, no distress shall be made for rent due more than one year before the making of the distress.

(3.) Actions and proceedings at law by landlord against tenant.—This Act provides that in all proceedings, proof of the perfection of the counterpart shall be equivalent to proof of perfection of the original lease; and if no counterpart be forthcoming, proof of a copy may be sufficient as against the tenant, and the next section makes the receipt of rent for one year (provided that such receipt be within three years preceding) prima facie evidence of title. The surrender to, or resumption by a landlord, or the eviction of any portion of the demised premises, shall not in any way prejudice his rights as to the residue of the premises. Every person entitled (in his own or any other right) to rent in arrear, whether the tenancy be continuing or not, may recover such rent by action in the superior courts, or, where the amount shall not exceed £100, at quarter sessions. And, where the amount of rent has not been fixed, the landlord may in like manner recover a reasonable sum for use and occupation of the premises. The law of distress remains untouched by this Act, except that, as before stated, one year's arrears only can henceforward be distrained for. But increased remedies of another kind are given in case of non-payment of rent, for where a year's arrears are due the landlord may instantly proceed by ejectment, and he is not now, as formerly, liable to be defeated by reason of the legal estate being in another person, provided he can show that he is beneficially entitled to the rent. The mode of service of the ejectment is also considerably simplified; but the changes in practice are not all for the landlord's benefit. The tenant is allowed to bring forward any defence—legal or equitable—that he may think proper; and even after decree obtained, he is allowed a space of six months for "redemption," within which, on payment of arrears and costs, he may be restored to possession of the premises, and may obtain such relief as a court of equity might have granted. Overholding tenants are made liable to double rent, and where the rent does not exceed £100, a mode of proceeding at quarter sessions is provided for the recovery of the premises; and means rates may also be recovered in like manner. But in the case of deserted premises, possession may be recovered by proceeding at sessions, whatever may be the annual value of the premises. Several other sections deal with the course of practice of the inferior courts in ejectments, &c., under this Act, and do not call for observation. When the title to the premises is in question, the jurisdiction of quarter sessions is altogether excluded by section 101.

There is a separate code for "cottier tenants," or tenants who hold any small plots of ground at monthly rents; these are entitled to have their cottages kept in repair by the landlord; and if dispossessed by him, are entitled to a "fair compensation" for growing crops, to be recovered by process at sessions. On the other hand, if the rent be not paid, or if waste be committed, the cottier tenant is liable to be evicted in a very summary manner.

Such are the outlines of an Act which embodies the whole existing law of landlord and tenant in Ireland, while it also introduces several well-considered changes. As an example of useful "consolidation," it is well worthy of imitation.

The following gentlemen were called to the bar on the 9th inst. :—

Robert Daniel, A.B., T.C.D., third son of Patrick Daniel, Grafton-street, Dublin, merchant. David Ross, A.M., and LL.B., Belfast College, Queen's University, second son of the Rev. Richard Ross, late of Dunbrin, county of Monaghan, deceased. The Hon. Henry Leeson, A.B., T.C.D., third son of Joseph, Earl of Miltown, of Russborough, county of Wicklow. Robert Patrick O'Hara, B.A., Caius College, Cambridge, only son of John O'Hara, late of Raheen, county of Galway, deceased. Isaac Heazle, A.B., T.C.D., eldest son of Wm. Heazle, of Cork. Robert Lyon Moore, A.B., T.C.D., eldest son of William Moore, late of Molenan, county Derry, deceased.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

(From the Gazette des Tribunaux, 17th Oct., by WILLIAM HACKETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.)

TRIBUNAL OF COMMERCE OF THE SEINE.

FOREIGN ANONYMOUS SOCIETY—ACTION TO NULLIFY SUBSCRIPTION FOR SHARES—INCOMPETENCE.

French tribunals will not take cognizance of an action by or against an anonymous society, having its chief seat of business in a foreign country, where the cause of action concerns the affairs of the society.

M. Panis had subscribed in 1853 for 400 shares of £20 each in the Anonymous Belgian Society of Mines, &c. He now claimed of the society that his subscription should be made null, and the sum of £8,000 recouped to him as the value of the shares. He maintained his claim on the ground that MM. Leclercq and Mouton, the delegated administrators of the society, instead of giving him shares reserved for public subscription, had transferred to him shares which had been given to them personally as the reward of their aid, and argued from this fact that he was not in reality a shareholder of the company, but a purchaser of the shares of the founders, and was entitled to sue them for a nullity of his subscription in a personal action. The defendants objected that the demand being against a company which had its seat at Charleroi, should have been brought before the Belgian tribunals. The Tribunal decided as follows:—

"Considering, that it results from the correspondence produced to the Tribunal, and addressed by Panis to the said Society of Mines, &c., that the said Panis, by undertaking to make the payments to which he was obliged as the holder of the shares, acknowledged himself the subscriber for these shares;

"Considering, that the action now commenced by Panis is in reality only intended to effect the nullity of his subscription; that the dispute is eminently and essentially one concerning the society; and that the society in question has its chief seat at Charleroi (in Belgium); that, therefore, the Tribunal is incompetent to take cognizance of the suit;

"For these reasons, declares itself incompetent; consequently remits the cause and the parties before the judges who ought to have cognizance of it, and condemns the plaintiff in costs."

COUR IMPERIALE DE DIJON.

FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION BY A TRADESMAN.

An action will lie for damages by one tradesman against another for assuming a title (such as agent for a particular purpose), without the license of the person authorised to confer the title.

The Court also, in such a case, will restrain the defendant from issuing advertisements thus founded on falsehood.

Aug. 13.—Boyer, a bookseller at Chalon-sur-Saône, inserted in the journals advertisements in which he styled himself sole agent for the Chant Lambillotte adopted by the diocese of Autun. Mulcey, also a bookseller at Chalon, pretending that these announcements contained untrue statements, and that they tended to deceive the public by representing Boyer as invested with an exclusive privilege which did not belong to him, summoned Boyer before the Tribunal of Commerce, claiming damages and the insertion of the judgment in four journals at the choice of the complainant. Boyer, on the other hand, maintained that, seeing that Mulcey did not qualify as the agent of the house of Leclère (the proprietors of the work in question), he had no right to dispute this quality in any one else, that the house of Leclère alone had a right to complain; and that Mulcey had not sustained any damage.

The Tribunal delivered the following judgment:—

"Considering that it is ascertained:

"1. That Boyer has, in repeated announcements, assumed the title of sole agent of the Chant Lambillotte adopted by the diocese of Autun.

"2. That this title in no manner belongs to him, since the editor Leclère declares that he has not established agencies of any kind in our city;

"Considering that by thus attributing to himself a privilege which he does not possess, Boyer has committed an act contrary to truth and to the usages of commerce, an act capable of injuring other bookselling houses, and for which they, and probably the complainant, have a right to demand reparation;

"That the law has pronounced in a formal manner the condemnation of these announcements founded on falsehood; that it thus made a decision in the Imperial Court of Paris of the 10th February, 1852, in the case of a merchant who, in his circulars pretended that he was the sole proprietor of the principal quarries of La Ferté;

"That it is of small importance that the editor and proprietor of the works in question permits his purchasers to take all the titles which suit them relatively to the said works, that the solution suggested by Boyer and consisting in this that Mulcey might in his turn assume the usurped character of sole agent of the same works, and respond to false assertions by assertions equally false, is contrary to the dignity and good-faith of commerce, and would be sufficient to prove the necessity of coercive measures on the part of the judicature;

"Considering, that a case has been made for the allowance of the conclusions of Mulcey, as relates to the cessation of the advertisements, and the publication of the decree for an injunction (jugement à intervenir), but that as concerns the damages claimed, there has not at present been any case made out, and in this respect it will be enough to impose on Boyer the expenses of publishing and of the present judgment."

On an appeal made by Boyer the Court confirmed the judgment and gave 200 francs damages against Boyer.

FRANCE.—Photograph visiting cards are now generally used in Paris by persons in every station of life. Such cards are to be seen in the shop window of every picture shop in Paris. The Imperial law officers, however, have discovered that according to the law of the 17th of February, 1852, no drawing or photograph can be exhibited or exposed for sale without the permission of the Minister of Police in Paris or the Prefects of Departments, under the penalty of imprisonment for a period of from one month to a year, a fine of from 100f. to 1,000f., and the confiscation of the prints so exhibited. MM. Huvier, the stationers in the Rue Laffitte, and Pesme, the photographic artist, were summoned to the Paris police court a few days since for having violated the law of the 17th of February, 1852. M. Pesme in his defence stated that he had never left a visiting card with the Minister. The president told him that as long as he confined himself to executing cards for private persons, and delivered them, it was all very well, but that when he exhibited them for sale he should comply with the law. The Imperial advocate said the law was formal. The president, after hearing counsel for the accused, sentenced MM. Huvier and Pesme to imprisonment for one month each, and to a fine of 100f., the cards to be confiscated.

PRUSSIA. The Assault Case at Bonn.—The inquiry instituted by the Court of Discipline (Disciplinarhof) into the conduct of M. Möller, the Procurer of Bonn, in the case of Captain Macdonald, has terminated. The investigation was ordered by the superior legal authorities, in consequence of the complaints made of the intemperate language used by M. Möller, while acting as public prosecutor in the charge of assault. The Court of Discipline does not review the facts of the case, only the conduct of the judicial functionary, as far as it is impugned. M. Möller, in explanation, stated that the terms he used did not apply to Englishmen in general, not even to all English travellers, but only to those who by their misbehaviour frequently provoked collisions with the authorities. But, as a question of demeanour and conduct, the superior judges have decided that M. Möller's violent language was unbecoming his judicial functions, and have therefore visited him with a reprimand.

Reviews.

The Practice of Wills and Administrations. By GEORGE S. ALLNUTT, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Fourth Edition. London: Crockford. 1860.

Of all the branches into which the practice of the law may be divided there is probably none more generally interesting, alike to the legal profession and to the community at large, than that which forms the title to this work. Almost every lawyer could name some one or department branch of legal practice of which he might be, or perhaps is, contentedly ignorant; while the administration of the law in almost all its branches is terra incognita to the laity. So intimately, however, does the law concerning the distribution of a dead man's property enter into the affairs of every-day life, that scarcely anybody above the position of the poorest labourer can pass through life without requiring once and again to consult his legal adviser with reference to his own or some relative's testamentary affairs, and no practising lawyer can fail to be frequently—nay, almost daily—so consulted. No wonder, then, that a subject of such general interest should have frequently called forth the energies of legal writers.

Accordingly, Swinburne, in the preface to his "Treatise of Testaments and Last Wills," long the most esteemed—and, perhaps, the only standard—authority on the subject, thus writes—"Great and wonderful is the number of the manifold writers of the civil and ecclesiastical laws, and so huge is the multitude of their sundry sorts of books, as lectures, counsels, tracts, decisions, questions, disputations, repetitions, cautels, clauses, common opinions, singulars, contradictions, concordances, methods, sums, practices, tables, repertories, and books of other kinds (apparent monuments of their endless and invincible labours), that, in my conceit, it is impossible for any one man to read over the hundredth part of their works, though living an hundred years he did intend none other work."

Let us hope, for the sake of our predecessors, that these observations are slightly exaggerated; yet, taken with the requisite grain of salt, Swinburne could not fail to see that they seemed but a strange sort of recommendation to the perusal of a new treatise. He therefore proceeds—"Wherefore, by the publishing of this testamentary treatise, I may be thought to pour water into the sea, to carry owls to Athens, and to trouble the reader with a matter altogether needless and superfluous. But yet for all this, in case this one little book may serve instead of many great volumes; then I hope that in the equal judgment of such as be indifferently affected, the same is rather to be admitted as commodious than rejected as superfluous."

The esteem with which the work thus prefaced has been handed down to us seems to indicate that the worthy jurist found his hearers "indifferently affected." We hope that Mr. Allnutt—who, we think, might make a similar apology—may have a satisfactory reception for his very useful compendium of testamentary law. This work has, we believe, in its earlier editions become so well known to the profession that we need not enlarge upon its general character. Suffice it to say that it is what it professes to be—a book of practice. The preparation, execution, and revocation of wills, and the grant of probate and letters of administration, and the management of the testator's or intestate's estate thereunder, are fully treated. The numerous and complicated questions upon the construction of wills have been intentionally omitted.

The plan of the work is as follows:—

The first book, on the "Preparation of Wills," contains five chapters. The first of these, "On Taking Instructions for a Will," contains many valuable suggestions; some of which, well deserving to be borne in mind by all solicitors, we do not remember to have met with in any similar work. Amongst these we would mention the advice given at p. 15, as to the importance of giving a pecuniary legacy to a residuary legatee—a precaution the neglect of which has disappointed the intentions of many a father, and the reasonable expectations of many a son. The laity have received a hint on this subject from Lord St. Leonards in his Handy Book; let us therefore hope that between lawyer and client the rock may be avoided hereafter.

The second chapter, "On Drawing Wills," will be found to contain, interspersed with the text, precedents for all the clauses most usually required in such wills as are commonly prepared without the assistance of conveyancing counsel. The remaining chapters on the execution, revocation, and re-publication require no special comment.

The second and third books, on "Probate and Administration," contain a careful account of the law, modified by recent legislation, with references to all the more important decisions of the Probate Court on points of practice, and, with the appendix, form a convenient book of reference for the use of practitioners in the Probate Court.

The fourth and last book, "On Winding up the Estate," is probably that which has cost Mr. Allnutt most trouble, and will save most trouble to his readers. We cannot help thinking that the author has acquired by personal experience as an executor, some of that knowledge of this part of his subject which he seeks to communicate. At least, he shows himself well prepared for that, too often, thankless office.

The Appendix contains, at full length, the enactments relating to the wills of seamen, &c. The Wills Amendment Act (1 Vict. c. 26); the Succession Duty Act; (the office forms relating to this tax will be found in their proper place in the body of the book), and the Court of Probate Acts of 1857 and 1858, and all the rules and orders, forms, and table of fees with reference to the business of the Probate Court.

We have only to add that considerable care seems to have been taken, during the preparation of the work, to notice all the more important decisions, so as to bring the law down to the most modern date; and that the cases cited in this little work, containing about 450 duodecimo pages, are nearly 1,200! We recommend the work to "the equal judgment of such as be indifferently affected."

Le Droit Pénal étudié dans ses Principes, dans les Usages et les Lois des différents Peuples du Monde. Par TISSOT, Professeur de Philosophie à la Faculté des Lettres de Dijon. 2 Vols. 8vo. Paris, 1860.

Paulus Pleydell remarked that a lawyer without literature was a mere mechanic, but that politer studies raised him to the rank of an architect. We are afraid that the English lawyers of the last generation were open to the reproach implied in the words of the learned advocate. There is a story told of Lord Eldon, remarking at the beginning of Michaelmas term, with the complacent air of a man who has achieved a wonderful effort, that he had read Milton's Paradise Lost during the long vacation. Doubtless his lordship thought that such a literary effort in a lawyer was an event worthy of being recorded among the ana of the bar. Whether this habit of ignoring the claims of literature be a necessity of the position of the English lawyer is a question which will find advocates on both sides; but we reserve the discussion of it for another occasion. Certain it is, that in other countries circumstanced not very dissimilarly from our own, as regards the learned professions—Ireland and Scotland for instance—the law is not so jealous a mistress as to banish from her domain the kindred studies of philosophy and history. In the United States the most distinguished statesmen and the most eminent diplomatists are, with few exceptions, members of the legal profession; and in France, up to a recent period, the bar reckoned amongst its members some of the most brilliant orators of the Chamber of Deputies. Whether the French bar is destined to succumb to the depressing influence of Imperial despotism, or whether the subtle mind which now rules France will fail in its endeavours to enslave a great nation, is a problem only to be solved by history. For our part, we can but hope that the sad forebodings of the greatest forensic orator living of France may not be realised, and that, having already lost the freedom of the press, the French nation may not be doomed to see the mouths of her advocates gagged and freedom of speech utterly extinguished.

For the moment, however, we have not to do with the lawyers of the Forum, but with those of the Academy, with those who in the leisure which the life of a college affords study and criticize the laws of all nations and all ages, and who from a comparison of the laws of different times and countries endeavour to establish the principles by which all legislation should be governed. Such has been the intention of the writer of the work which we have named at the head of this paper, and which as its name indicates is a comparison of the principal criminal codes of the world—an inquiry which is of great interest both for the historian and the philosopher. For, the object of the criminal law being the prevention of all acts which violate public order, it would seem that the increase or diminution of these offences is the most exact measure of morality as well as of social prosperity. This idea, by which M. Tissot appears to have been moved, would alone suffice to mark the philosophical and political importance of the work in question. But its worth in a purely juridical point of view is not less. How many lawyers do we not see who, keeping to the letter of the law, do not trouble themselves concerning its spirit, its history, or its developments? How many others are exclusively devoted to the civil law, because they have neither sufficient largeness of mind to seize the great ideas of the criminal law, nor sufficient generosity of heart to study principles which, although touching the gravest interests of mankind, have rarely the privilege of enriching laborious students? M. Tissot repudiates these unworthy tendencies of elevated understandings. The lawyer should know all branches of the law (magister in utroque jure), and amongst them especially that which protects the life, the honour, the liberty of citizens. What would become of the interests regulated by the civil law, without public order, which has its principal foundation in the criminal law? Hence the necessity of a serious study of the principles of criminal law. Jurisprudence, moreover, according to the theories so ably maintained by Rossi, Ortolan, and Mittermaier, is connected with all species of knowledge; all bring to it the tribute of their enlightenment, and become partially incorporated with it. It is, then, true to say, with Nicolini, that it constitutes an immense branch of human knowledge. Now, those sciences which are most intimately connected with the criminal law are philosophy and history, without which it would be nothing more than a tariff of punishments. Nay more, how would it be possible to draw up this tariff without a profound knowledge of man, his nature, his faculties, his wants, his passions; without taking into account the fundamental principles of society, the universal ideas of morality and justice, the origin and precedents of legislation—all things which are peculiarly of the province of history and philosophy?

It is to the close union of the criminal law with these two studies that we owe the comparison which the learned professor just attempted to make; a difficult and bold undertaking, since it implies at once the talent of the historian, the philosopher, and the lawyer. The archives of the criminal law already reckon, independently of numerous commentaries, partial treatises on the origin of law, on the history of law, on its philosophy, as well as on comparative law. M. Tissot desires to do more; he has attempted to condense into one work all the teachings which history, comparative legislation and philosophy present to us, at all times and in all places, concerning repressive law; and this, with the triple object—1, of tracing the progress of mankind by the progress of criminal law; 2, of enlightening, by the labours of the past, those of future legislators; and, finally, of discerning the vices of ancient and existing enactments, ordinances and codes by the light of absolute and immutable rules. It is sufficient to say that the author has not intended to study any particular criminal code; he contemplates universal penal legislation in the principles on which it rests, in the progress which it has made, and in the portion which is equally applicable to all nations, as an assemblage of human creatures, endowed with similar understandings, similar organs, and similar moral or material wants. He thinks, with Vico, that there is a certain part of criminal law which, being essentially founded upon the eternal rules of the immutable reason and nature of man, may be considered as common to all nations, and which, by way of general international law, should contribute to the work of harmonious unity which is the object of civilisation. It no doubt requires enormous labour to extract from the mass of ancient and modern legislation the fruitful and luminous principles of this universal penal law. "In order," says M. Tissot, "properly to apprehend the legislation of a nation, it is necessary thoroughly to understand the nature of that nation; the social, political, religious, moral, intellectual, economical, and physical circumstances which have attended its existence; all these conditions once given, it is easy to determine what, in the legislation of this people, is not founded on reasons drawn from human nature generally, and which consequently can only be explained by exceptional and temporary circumstances; now, as often as human nature, regarded in its essence, in its destiny, is wounded by a positive legislation, consider that this legislation is faulty, is vicious, theoretically speaking, whatever may be the circumstances or necessities to explain it."

Such is the method which the author has applied to the legislation of each nation, carefully and faithfully studied in its order; such is the mode of examination which he has deemed the safest to lead to a sound and rational criticism. No doubt, there is much danger in such an appreciation; but, owing to the cool and logical habits of his mind, to the variety of his historical knowledge, the author has accomplished, with great success and ingenuity, the task which he has undertaken. For the rest, whether we adopt the conclusions of the learned professor, or whether we modify them in whole or in part, certain it is that by the aid of these innumerable comparative investigations, by the aid of this vast panorama of the criminal laws of the old world, and the world of our own day, every competent reader may henceforth study, not merely the progress of the civilization of some one nation in particular, but also by comparing together the different states of the criminal law as regards situation and movement, obtain, in each age, a pretty exact general idea of the advance, the immobility or the retrogression, of mankind; in fine, if he wished, on a given point of criminal law, to group together all the opinions of legislators, it will be possible, enlightened by the experience and the most universal practices of the past, and with perfect knowledge of all the facts, controlled by the science and enlightenment of the present time, to judge of the defects of existing laws, as well as of the improvements which should be made now for the benefit of succeeding times.

We will conclude our notice of the valuable work of the learned professor, by mentioning that the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences has characterized it as exhibiting "a masculine style, deep learning, an understanding accustomed to meditations on the philosophy of law, much and skilful labour, in effect, as being a remarkable treatise in which theory and criticism go hand in hand and mutually aid each other in showing the essence, the rules and the applications, of the criminal law."

Obituary.

MR. ALDERMAN WIRE.

The obituary for the last week contains the respected name of Mr. Alderman Wire, who died on the 9th inst., at his residence at Lewisham. On that very day two years he entered upon the office of Lord Mayor of London, and was soon after seized with an attack of paralysis, consequent it was considered upon the excitement of the occasion. This distemper prevented him from discharging the duties of that important office with his usual energy, and continued to affect him until the period of his death. On the 5th inst., he took part in some civic business, but, on the same night, he suffered a second attack of paralysis, under which he gradually sank, and to which his death is to be attributed.

The deceased gentleman was in the 59th year of his age, and was the son of a hatter in Colchester. He came to London at a very early age in search of position and fortune, both of which he succeeded in attaining by the most honorable means. He entered the office of Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, the City Commissioner of Police, but then in practice as a solicitor, and while in Mr. Harvey's office, he became acquainted with a Mr. Dixon, since deceased, then an articled clerk, and the son of a licensed victualler. When Mr. Dixon commenced business upon his own account, Mr. Wire articulated himself to him, and eventually, about thirty-five years ago, became his partner. The firm at that time conducted its business in St. Swithin's-lane, and rose to repute and influence chiefly through Mr. Dixon's connection with the body of licensed victuallers, with whom Mr. Wire also closely identified himself. Upon the death of Mr. Dixon, Mr. Wire conducted business for some time alone, until, being appointed as under-sheriff to Sir James Duke, he entered into a partnership with Mr. Child, whom he had known from boyhood, and which connexion subsisted until the period of Mr. Wire's death. Mr. Wire, from an early age, led a very active life in political, and also in civic matters. He was four times under-sheriff, and was sheriff four years ago. After receiving a requisition signed by almost every elector of the ward of Walbrook, in which he resided, he successfully competed for an aldermanic gown. He took a lively interest in the internal administration of Newgate, and suggested many important improvements in its discipline; and was also chairman of the committee under whose superintendence Holloway prison was built. He was exceedingly energetic in his professional and public functions, and watched zealously the reforms of the corporation, of whose rights he was a firm champion. Mr. Wire was in politics a Liberal, even at his outset in life, when fashion and interest were on the other side; he took an active part formerly in the elections for Colchester, when Mr. Harmer used to sit for that borough, and latterly in the elections for the City of London, in neither of which, nor in any of his public capacities, did he ever hold professional retainers. He sought a public and active life, however, in which he always conducted himself creditably, and with service to the cause which he espoused; and from his disinterestedness, and the absence from his mind of mercenary motives, he was enabled to gratify his desire of a prominent position before the public, to the satisfaction of his friends, and with the esteem of his opponents. He contributed extensively to the daily press in his youth, but did not indulge in recidite studies. Mr. Wire's assistance, both by suggestions and by liberal contributions, was of eminent use to Dr. Reed in the establishment of the Asylum for the Fatherless and for Idiots, as also with regard to the Royal Hospital for Incurables.

The London University engaged a considerable share of Mr. Wire's attention; and he was also a supporter of the local institutions of Colchester. The chief event in his life was his mission as assistant to Sir Moses Montefiore, about twenty years ago, to Rome and Constantinople, on behalf of the Jews, who were accused, at least by rumour, of having murdered not only children, as was the usual gist of the charges against them, but also a priest named Father Tomazo. While the excitement consequent upon these rumours prevailed at Damascus, many Jews were massacred in that city during an insurrection of the people against them. The object of the mission of Sir Moses Montefiore was to have the Turkish authorities of Damascus, who had connived at the massacre, brought to punishment. This was summarily effected by order of the Turkish Government, the governor of Damascus being at once, at the moment of his arrest, beheaded on the spot, without trial or examination. Sir Moses Montefiore succeeded in obtaining satisfactory firmans from the sultan acquitting the Jews of all complicity in the alleged murders, and he likewise at Rome obtained the removal of a record containing an allegation of their having murdered Father Tomazo. Upon Mr. Wire's return to England, the Jews presented him with a piece of plate, as a testimonial for his valuable and effective service to their interests and character. In this, as in all his other non-professional acts, Mr. Wire acted from disinterested motives, prompted to such troublesome avocations by an active mind not entirely absorbed in business, and from an honourable desire of a public position and name. Mr. Wire was the fourth solicitor, we think, who has attained the dignity of chief magistrate within the last twenty years. Alderman Anthony Brown was the last solicitor, before Mr. Wire, who filled the office of Lord Mayor of London. Sir Thomas Wood, and Alderman Harmer, were likewise solicitors. Mr. Wire, during his year of office, was incapacitated by paralysis from discharging the duties of that station, greatly, doubtless, to the loss of the corporation, whose rights and internal administration received such able attention from him while in an unofficial position.

Mr. Wire contested the representation of Boston and of Greenwich, in which it is supposed that he expended a considerable sum of money. In the honorable career of Mr. Wire, the young solicitor may see a guide and model for his imitation. The son of humble but respectable parents comes to London, while yet in early youth, and, by his own unaided industry, gradually obtains the esteem and confidence of his clients and fellow-citizens, and finally fills the highest civic chair.

Almost the only important act, of Alderman Wire during his year of mayoralty, in connection with his profession, was presiding at the dinner of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, of which he was an active member, having been one of the committee of that body.

THE LATE GEORGE MEDD BUTT, ESQ., Q.C.

We regret to have to announce the death of Mr. George Medd Butt, Q.C., formerly M.P. for Weymouth, which event occurred at his residence in Eaton-square on Sunday last. The deceased gentleman was the son of Mr. John Butt, of Sherborne, and in early life practised for some years with great success as a special pleader. In 1830, being then thirty-three years of age, he was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Inner Temple, and went the Western Circuit, where he soon rose into reputation, and acquired an extensive practice. In 1845, during the Chancellorship of Lord Lyndhurst, Mr. Butt was made a Queen's Counsel, and shortly afterwards was elected a bencher of the Inner Temple. In July, 1852, he was returned member for Weymouth. It was confidently expected that Mr. Butt would have been raised to the judicial bench during Lord Derby's tenure of office, but his chance never came. In private life and in the profession of which he was a member, Mr. Butt was held in high esteem.

There were 20,531 coroners' inquests held last year, at an expense of £60,920 16s. 6d., being an average of £3 19s. 4d. each inquest in England and Wales.

M. Vatimesnil, the eminent French jurist, died on Tuesday, the 13th inst., after a long illness, at his country residence, near Paris.

SELLING BEER AT FAIRS AND RACES.—Messrs. J. and S. Langham, solicitors, of Hastings, in a letter which appeared in the Times of the 10th instant, called the attention of licensed victuallers and others, who have been accustomed to set up booths at fairs and races, for the purpose of retailing beer, to the recent statute, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 113, s. 37, which they considered rendered retailing beer at any other place than at the house and premises specified in the license, an offence against the inland revenue laws, and would subject the offender to a penalty of £20 for each offence. In reply to this letter, Mr. G. C. Oke, the assistant clerk to the Lord Mayor, and the able and learned author of the "Magisterial Synopsis," and other works, in a communication, which appeared in the same journal on the 12th instant, states that the persons alluded to have no fear of a prosecution by the inland revenue board, and refers to an extract from a recent communication of the board to the clerk to the magistrates at Carmarthen on the subject. The following is a copy of the extract referred to:—"The board are advised that it was not intended by the 37th section of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 113, to repeal the privilege, expressly granted by former Acts, of selling beer without licence at legally constituted fairs and races, and that such privilege and exemption still exist."

It is fortunate for our county court judges that they do not live in Texas. We read in the Nacarro (Texas) Express, the following paragraph: "On Thursday morning, the 2nd instant, four respectable citizens of this county, all members of the county court, were found hung in the public square of this town. Various are the conjectures as to the causes of this unfortunate affair. We presume, however, that it was owing to the fact that they were members of the county court. In saying this we must here enter our declaration that we know of no conduct of theirs which deserved such a severe penalty. It is thought the presence of the Chief Justice could have saved them from such a fate. As we shall hereafter speak more of this matter, we withhold comment until we are in possession of all the facts connected with this melancholy affair." We are no longer surprised at the commonness of the phrase—"To h—ll or Texas."

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT.—The number of public general acts that passed in the late session, which commenced on the 24th of January, and ended on the 28th of August, was 155, and the local acts 202; total, 357.

CERTAINTY IN LIFE ASSURANCE.

The conditions and limitations contained in Ordinary Life Policies deprive them of present value, and make their ultimate effect dependent upon the result of future investigations, to be commenced only after the death of the assured life.

THE INDISPUTABLE LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY of SCOTLAND was instituted for the purpose of obviating these defects, and granting indefeasible Policies of complete security.

"CASE FOR THE OPINION OF COUNSEL."

"This Company was formed for the purpose of granting Life Assurance Policies which should be absolutely Indisputable, and the following form of Policy has been adopted. (Copy Policy).

"The Opinion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Mr. J. NAPIER HIGGINS is requested.

"Whether a Policy in the above form would be Disputable by the Company upon any ground whatever, and if so, upon what ground."

"WE ARE OF OPINION THAT (assuming the Assured to have an Insurable Interest in the Life within the Provisions of 14 Geo. III., c. 48) A POLICY IN THE FORM STATED ABOVE WOULD BE INDISPUTABLE BY THE COMPANY, BOTH AT LAW AND IN EQUITY.

"RICHARD BETHELL, Attorney-General.

"J. NAPIER HIGGINS."

"IT IS QUITE COMPETENT to stipulate that the money assured shall be paid, on the sole condition that the party whose life was assured was alive at the date of the Policy, and thus exclude the questions which have so frequently occurred as to the truth or falsehood of the representations which led to the contract. I AM OF OPINION THAT THE FORM OF POLICY SUBMITTED TO ME DOES ACCOMPLISH THIS OBJECT.

"J. MONCREIFF, Lord Advocate, and Dean of the Faculty of Advocates of Scotland.

UNITED KINGDOM LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 8, WATERLOO PLACE, PALM MALL, LONDON, S.W.

The Funds or Property of the Company as at 31st December, 1858, amounted to £652,618 : 3 : 10, invested in Government or other approved securities.

The Hon. FRANCIS SCOTT, CHAIRMAN.

CHARLES BERWICK CURTIS, Esq., DEPUTY CHAIRMAN.

INVALID LIVES.—Persons not in sound health may have their lives insured at equitable rates.

ACCOMMODATION IN PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.—Only one-half of the Annual Premium, when the Insurance is for life, is required to be paid for the first five years, simple interest being charged on the balance. Such arrangement is equivalent to an immediate advance of 50 per cent. upon the Annual Premium, without the borrower having recourse to the unpleasant necessity of procuring Sureties, or assigning and thereby parting with his Policy, during the currency of the Loan, irrespective of the great attendant expenses in such arrangement.

The above mode of Insurance has been found most advantageous where Policies have been required to cover monetary transactions, or when incomes applicable for Insurance are at present limited, as it only necessitates half the outlay formerly required by other Companies before the present system was instituted by this Office.

LOANS are granted likewise on real and personal securities.

Forms of Proposals and every information afforded on application to the Resident Director, 8, Waterloo-place, Palm Mall, London, S.W.

By order,

E. LENNOX BOYD, Resident Director.

IMPORTANT TO SOLICITORS AND MEN OF BUSINESS.

THE LIFE ASSOCIATION OF SCOTLAND

(FOUNDED 1838), is now issuing Life Assurance Policies, free of restrictions and conditions—not liable to any charge for Extra Premiums,—and virtually non-forfeitable and unquestionable. The Policy-holders can also withdraw a fixed proportion of their payments either as a loan or for the surrender of the policies. Explanatory Pamphlets of this new system will be furnished on application.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, NOVEMBER 24, 1860.

CURRENT TOPICS.

All the courts of equity will rise on Monday next, the last day of term. They will sit again on Tuesday, the 4th day of December, which is fixed as the first seal day after term. About the usual amount of ordinary business has been got through since the courts met after the long vacation, while an unusually large number of appeals has been disposed of; the Lord Chancellor having sat uninterruptedly throughout the term, and heard and decided numerous important appeals.

The Court of Divorce appears still to be the most flourishing of all our courts, in point of business. It appears that there are at present about 200 cases in the paper for hearing, which—taking into account the very large number disposed of before the last long vacation—would lead us to expect a permanently large amount of divorce business.

The courts of common law have been all kept tolerably well occupied during the present term, but few cases of any considerable importance have been heard this term in Westminster Hall.

Mr. Samuel Morley, who appears to be the chairman and factotum of some society for the Amendment of the Mercantile Law, has been going about the country making speeches in favour of the Attorney General's Bankruptcy Bill. As the result of Mr. Morley's labours some resolutions have been passed pledging certain local bodies to the principles enunciated by the Bill. We have only to remark that the utility of such adventitious aids is extremely doubtful, and so Sir Richard Bethell seems to think if we may judge from a recent letter from him on this subject. Unless the grievances complained of are sufficient of themselves to cause those whom they affect to cry out, when the Bill comes before Parliament it will be found that factitious clamour will be unavailing. There is no occasion now-a-days to get up extensive organisations, and to retain peripatetic orators, for the purpose of bringing about any real amendment of the law. Law officers of the crown, and cabinet ministers are generally but too glad to take in hand the remedying of any legal grievances affecting a considerable portion of the community; and there is always some danger of mis-legislation in attempting reforms of law which are suggested by small but active bodies of men who have made such grievances a specialité.

It would be far better that mercantile men throughout the provinces, in their chambers of commerce, should discuss the forthcoming Bill amongst themselves and without any bias from the eloquence of Mr. Morley, although for our own parts we are disposed to agree in the main with the views propounded by him.

Mr. Serjeant Pigott has been elected member to represent the borough of Reading in Parliament.

The Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn have appointed as Chaplain to the Society the Rev. Charles John D'Oyly, M.A., son of the late Rev. Dr. D'Oyly, formerly Rector of Lambeth.

M. BERRYER ON ADVOCACY IN FRANCE.

A conflict has lately occurred in France between the public ministers of justice and the bar, respecting the limits of the liberty of defence, which has resulted in a grave usurpation on the part of the former, a corresponding loss of independence in the latter, and a great detriment to the public in respect of its rights of defence. M. Ollivier, as counsel for the defence on a recent trial, having designated the charge of the official prosecutor as an appeal to the most irritating passions, was pronounced guilty of a want of respect to the public administration of justice, and his condemnation was subsequently confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The decision is understood as declarative of a right on the part of the public ministers of justice to a peculiar exemption from comment or imputation on the score of motives or passions, and has been received by the bar with a strong feeling of protest. A well-written pamphlet has been published "on the relations between the public ministry of justice and the bar," directed chiefly to the question of the liberty of defence, with an introductory letter by M. Berryer, the veteran advocate of fifty years' standing, who pronounces "the publication of such a work both opportune and even necessary, after the opinions and judgments that have been recently expressed in judicial quarters."

An attempt is made (writes M. Berryer) to invent new principles and apply them in the courts of criminal and correctional jurisdiction, for regulating the conditions of the contest, and the very modes of address between the prosecution and the defence. The extreme deference, the attitude of subordination which it is pretended to impose on advocates towards their opponents, the superior authority attributed to the latter, would make serious inroads upon the rights of defence, and the independence and dignity of the bar—those indispensable guarantees of the impartial distribution of justice. In losing freedom of speech we lose also freedom of thought; just complaints are suppressed, the voice of conscience is stilled, our past life is extinguished. Memoriam quoque cum voce perdidissemus.

The strong line of demarcation in France between the law officers of the State and the independent portion of the bar—involving such peculiar relations and conflicts—has no correspondence amongst the counsel representing the Crown and the rest of the bar in this country. Here, the prosecuting counsel are retained from the rest of the bar for the occasion only; the highest law officers are distinguished from the bar only by their connection with the Government for the time being, and no distinction exists on which a greater license or dignity need be attributed to those who act on behalf of the State as against private interests. Indeed, in criminal cases, the practice is governed by sentiments of a quite opposite character, and the counsel for the Crown is expected to act with a moderation and reserve which would be out of place in his opponent struggling for the life or liberty of his client.

It is remarkable, however, that the bar in France and in England were originally in a very similar position with respect to the State service, and it is instructive to observe the causes and growth of the changes which have since occurred in the former country. In the early days of the bar in France, as in England, no distinction existed between its members as serving the State or serving private persons. The King selected from the rank of advocates the most eminent and the best qualified to conduct the law business of the Crown, under the titles of procureurs and avocats du roi, or avocats généraux. The public business was assigned to these exclusively, though they might employ their leisure in the affairs of private persons. The rest of the bar were restricted to the conduct of private business.

These permanent retainers by the Crown were the origin of the subsequently highly-organised public ministry of justice. The duties of the Crown lawyers gradually extended over all the public department of justice, and were regulated in a strictly official form. Under this head were comprised the magistracy, the functions of the Crown in respect of prosecutions, and all the proprietary and executive rights of the Crown in connection with the law. The public ministers of justice who fulfilled these functions were members of the local parliaments or courts of justice, and irremovable. They thus held an independent position, which enabled and interested them in asserting the pre-eminence of the law against usurpations and infringements, from all quarters. Their official position superseded that of the mere barrister, and in course of time the law officers were forbidden to undertake private business. Nevertheless, they retained their connection with the order of advocates, amongst whom they took precedence at the head of the list. They obeyed its internal rules of discipline, and were zealous to maintain its privileges and independence, and contributed chiefly, by the dignity and authority of their offices, to raise the noblesse de la robe to a higher point of social and political importance than has been attained by the bar in any other country.

Such was the connection between the bar and the public ministry of justice under the ancient regime. The modern principles of government subsequent to the Revolution effected a complete change. The local parliaments, with their magistracies, law officers, and advocates, which had for so long formed an effective safeguard for law and justice, were all swept away by the Revolution; and the administration of justice was re-constituted upon the bureaucratic principles which have since prevailed. The public ministry of justice was re-organised strictly as a department of the Government. Its officers were made removable at will, and brought entirely under the control of the central power. They were cut off from their ancient connection and sympathy with the bar, and stripped of the independence which they formerly vindicated as members of that profession. Napoleon hated advocates, and would have dispensed with them altogether. In a characteristic ebullition of temper he called them a set of conspirators, who did nothing but hatch crimes and treasons. "I should like," said he, "to cut out the tongue of the advocate who acts against the Government." Under the Empire, the order of advocates was re-constituted with very attenuated rights and liberties. After the Restoration it was again invested with its ancient usages and discipline, and enabled to resume its duties with suitable independence and dignity.

The policy of organising the conduct of all the public law business in an official form has thus led to an entire separation between the bar and the law officers; or, rather, has cut off from the bar, properly so-called, all employment in public business, leaving it exclusively to the conduct of private interests. In criminal matters, its office is confined to the defence. Notwithstanding the long historical connection between the public ministry of justice and the rest of the bar, accompanied with such brilliant results, the two bodies now appear directly opposed to one another, both in interest and in spirit. The one is considered as the advocate of the interests of the State and of justice, while the other is treated as a public enemy. The former have, in fact, become the mere servants of a despotic authority, while the latter are the last representatives of individual liberty, and are engaged in a struggle to maintain their very existence.

M. Berryer thus writes of this relation between the bar and the public officers of the law, which we have endeavoured above to explain:—

There is a tendency manifest in the present day fraught with great danger to the State, to diverge from the manners and principles which formerly in France united the magistracy and the bar. It is well to recall these to mind, and to point out the common origin whence arose both the order of advocates and the great and wise institution of the public ministry of justice. In early times the advocates were frequently called upon to appear for the Crown and for the State, without ceasing to plead in private causes, and thus, their service of the Crown being restricted to the occasion only, they lost nothing of the spirit of their order, or of zeal for its independence. When, in later times, these functions were constituted into offices, the most illustrious of our magistrates deemed it an honour to have risen from the bar, and the most eminent of these great men were the most eager to respect our traditions and liberties. So long as our advocates shall remember what De Mesmes, De Vair, Pasquier, Talon, Sequier, d'Aguesseau, spoke and wrote concerning the prerogatives and dignity of their profession, they will remain fully instructed as to the limits both of their rights and duties.

The melancholy contrast which now presents itself to the sentiments which the crown officers formerly entertained towards the order of advocates, can be attributed only to the new conditions of the appointment, advancement, and discipline of the magistracy.

The policy of an official organization of all the functions of the State, notwithstanding it appears to be fraught with such disastrous consequences to liberty, seems to find favour with French jurists, and to be in harmony with the national idea of government. M. Berryer, as seen above, describes the public ministry of justice, whose encroachments he is combating, as "a great and wise institution;" and we find the same institution spoken of in the pamphlet before us, in the following terms of admiration:—

France may lay claim to the public ministry of justice as an institution eminently national. What idea could be more noble or more Christian than to remove the prosecution of crimes from the hands of private vengeance; to pursue evildoers with the terrors of the law, without exposing honest men to the greedy attacks of common informers; to secure the punishment of crimes at the same time that the denunciation of them is made honourable?

Now that the proposal for a system of public prosecution happily finds favour in England, it may be well to notice the extreme effects of the policy in question as illustrated by the recent encroachments on the French bar; and to be warned in time so to mould the institution as to avoid the danger of setting up a body of officials armed with authority, and imbued with a spirit, hostile to the advocacy of private interests, and to the rights of defence. It is but recently that the English law has fully recognised the right of the accused to meet his accuser on equal terms, by allowing him to appear by counsel; and under the present system we are at least sure that liberty of speech on behalf of the defence is safe in the hands of the advocates, by whom it is so liberally exercised throughout the country.

The second empire is actuated by the same spirit of enmity to the independence of the bar as the first, but is conducted with more temper and address. It has succeeded in clipping the tongues which the first Napoleon vainly longed to cut out by the roots. The recent decision of the French courts places the advocate on terms of inequality and inferiority to his official opponent. All comment on the motives or actuating spirit of the prosecution is forbidden as a contempt of public justice. The argumentum ad hominem is interdicted; and the defence is restricted to the dry syllogisms of logic. The advocate is thus not only deprived of his most dangerous offensive weapon, but is stripped of his most effectual armour of defence; and in this manner does he enter the lists against the full panoply of the champion of Government. Upon what unequal terms is the French subject reduced to contend with the Government for his life and liberty, property, and honour?

Perfect equality in the presence of the judge seems the first axiom of justice; yet in the France of the present day it is judicially denied, and the following able and eloquent arguments of M. Berryer serve only as a protest against its denial:—

and necessity of a perfect and reciprocal liberty of discussion between the advocate and the organ of public justice. In forensic contests, particularly before criminal tribunals, where the lives of men, or those possessions most dear to them, honour and liberty, are disposed of, the general interests of society are divided. If it is important to the authority of the law that the vigilance of the magistrate should preserve society from the misdeeds which threaten its peace, and that a just punishment should fall upon the authors of crimes which have carried desolation and ruin into its bosom, it is no less important to the safety of all that unjust accusations should be repelled, that a man should not be deemed guilty simply because he is accused, and that he should be energetically defended against the errors, the passions, the ignorance, and the weaknesses of his judges, be they magistrates or juries. How astonished we should be to see the organ of Government, prosecuting for some great crime—a horrible attempt, some dastardly treason or foul libel—open his case without boldness or indignation, and without an urgent appeal for public vengeance? Ought not the question of guilt or innocence, the evidence of right or wrong, the manifestation of truth or falsehood, to arouse an equal passion in the hearts? Do not they claim the same authority of speech, the same energy of language? When the lists are once opened between the prosecution and the defence the contest should be fought with equal arms.

In the barbarous ages of judicial combats, when a gentleman appealed a villain, he was bound to present himself on foot with staff and buckler; and if he came mounted with the arms of his rank, his arms and horse were taken from him; he was stripped to his shirt, and was compelled to fight in that condition against the villain. This impartial practice of a rude equality, in the contest which established innocence by victory, betokens even in that ignorant age an instinctive sentiment of fairness, and a simple desire to ascertain the truth which we no longer find in the phraseology of modern writers, who claim to invest one of the champions in the judicial arena with a greater authority, to assign to him a greater liberty, and to impose upon the judges of the contest a greater deference for his convictions and opinions, than is to be accorded to his adversary.

Such claims are quite incompatible with the free scope required by the advocate for the exercise of his vocation, and far exceed what is fairly due by the mere rules of decency and courteous intercourse. A proper respect and courtesy towards his opponent are the willing homage of every advocate who claims himself to be respected, and impose no constraint upon the freedom of his thought or language. M. Berryer speaks with the authority of a master in describing what are the liberal requirements and the wide limits necessary for the practice of his vocation.

Quick repartee, vehement apostrophe, home-thrust argument, sarcasm, even invective, are the vivifying and sustaining breath of forensic eloquence when she wings her loftiest flights. Nay, they are the emanations of conviction, the unprepared and unexpected evidences of a clear conscience, the response of the devotion and zeal due from the advocate to the cause which he has promised to sustain. How many are persuaded that an objection is unanswerable which is not repeated with a startling burst of energy?

Truth reaches not the understanding unaided; God has not granted to every judge the eye which sees, the ear which hears, oculum evidentem et aurem audientem. What efforts are often necessary to force open the understanding? Truth must be borne constantly forward, and all obstacles must be crushed before it. Fit via vi. Obstacles are innumerable. Bossuet, who knew all the weaknesses of men and of human institutions, turns his observant eyes upon the judges assembled in their tribunal. "One," says he, "disturbs your thoughts with his precipitation, another damps your spirits with his unsettled and doubtful countenance; this one puts on an habitually good-humoured look and lets his thoughts wander, so that you cannot arrest his distracted attention; that one, harder still, has his ears closed with prejudice, and incapable of expanding to the reasons of another's mind, listens only to what is passing in his own. Not to speak of the shame and reproach of corruption, we may also mention the cowardice or the license of that arbitrary justice which, without rule or maxim, turns itself about to serve the will of the power which befriends it." It has always been the task of the orator at the bar to encounter and subdue these obstacles of the head and of the heart; and now that the contest between the prosecution and the defence is conducted before a jury, with whom it is so easy and natural to reconcile their consciences by obeying the voice of Mr. Attorney-General, who would dare to prescribe for the defending counsel an attitude of timorous deference towards his antagonist, or compel him to abandon any portion of his true dignity, and of the force of his convictions? What would become of justice? What would become of the sacred liberty of defence?

M. Berryer draws a melancholy picture of the present state of advocacy, sitting in solitary grandeur amongst the ruin of liberties, in France.

When the tribune is mute, or its voice heard only in imperfect echoes; when the censorship of the press undisguisedly interposes its official warnings; when the journals are subjected to the fear of summary suspension or suppression; when the right of petition is placed under the protection of the senate, just as under the first empire the liberty of the individual and of the press were entrusted to senatorial commissions; when ministerial responsibility is abolished, and criticism of public acts may be at once construed into outrage or attack upon the head of the State, from whom all things proceed, and to whom all things turn; when the hopes of promotion corrupt the independency of the magistracy; when impatience for the success of prosecutions denounces judicial moderation or indulgence, as paralyzing justice, and ruining the cause of morality—the independence of the bar remains the only bulwark to the citizen against the angry assaults of power, the violation of rights, and groundless persecution. The worst may be feared if this is mutilated; nothing need be despaired of if it is maintained and respected. My hope is, that through the bar will triumph the persevering efforts of sound reason, the spirit of justice and of public virtue. I may, at least, say with d'Agnesseau, through the bar will be heard the last cry of expiring liberty.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

We lately printed a paper which was read by Mr. J. Campbell Smith, advocate, at the recent meeting of the National Association in Glasgow, the design of which was to contrast the modes of criminal procedure adopted in England and in Scotland respectively. It was, moreover, Mr. Smith's object to point out that each country might borrow with advantage from the jurisprudence of the other; and we believe that every unprejudiced person who considers the subject cannot fail to arrive at the same conclusion. Both systems have in fact their acknowledged excellences, and their undoubted defects. These have been thoroughly tested by centuries of experience, and the obviously wise course would now be to assimilate, as far as possible, the criminal procedure of the two countries by retaining the good and rejecting the bad in each. We are aware that many popular prejudices must be overcome before this much to be desired consummation is likely to be attained. But looking to the great and beneficial changes which have recently been effected in the law, we entertain sanguine hopes that steps will be taken before long for assimilating in its most important features the system of criminal procedure in the two countries.

Mr. Smith appears to consider that the great defect of the English system is the want of public prosecutors duly authorised to act on the part of the Crown, and to take the necessary steps to bring offenders to justice. It is but a short time since we called the attention of our readers to this anomaly in English jurisprudence. We pointed out the serious consequences resulting from it, and referred to the various plans that have from time to time been suggested for its removal. We need hardly say, therefore, that we entirely concur in Mr. Smith's views as to the superiority of the Scottish system in this respect. Let us take for example the case of the Road-hill murder, which is now exciting so extraordinary an amount of interest throughout the kingdom; all the investigations which have taken place respecting it, with the exception of the coroner's inquest, have been of the most anomalous description. From the arrival of Mr. Whicher, the detective, on the scene, until the latest exhibition of Mr. Saunders, all the proceedings have been singularly irregular, if not wholly unprecedented in our criminal annals; and yet they have obviously arisen from the necessities of the case. The coroner's inquest having failed in pointing out the guilty person it was literally the duty of no one in particular to pursue the matter any further. Hence the interference of the executive authorities became not only justifiable, but inevitable under the circumstances. In Scotland, had the murder taken place there, no such necessity would have existed. It would have been the duty of the officer upon the spot, the procurator fiscal, to have examined every witness who could throw any manner of light upon the subject, and to have continued his investigations so long as a chance remained of getting at the truth. Had such an officer existed in England, there would have been no reason for the appointment of Mr. Slack to perform the duties of a public prosecutor, and we should have heard nothing of the extraordinary proceedings of Mr. Saunders. We entirely agree with what the Recorder of Warwick, Sir Eardley Wilmot, publicly stated the other day regarding this case—viz., that it was another striking instance, if, indeed, one were wanting, of the necessity which existed for the appointment of such an officer in England.

But while admitting that Scotland has the advantage of us in respect of her possessing a public prosecutor, we cannot help thinking that there is one privilege possessed by that officer which is to the last degree unconstitutional and unjust. We all know what the practice is in England when a person is brought before a magistrate charged with any crime. After the witnesses have all been heard, the prisoner is asked whether he has anything to say in his defence, but with the caution that whatever he does say may be used in evidence against him: but until the whole case against him has been heard, no one has a right to put a question to him. It is otherwise in Scotland. Mr. Smith informs us that,—“As soon as possible after his apprehension, and before he can take advice, which, indeed, is shut out from him, the accused is taken before the sheriff or other magistrate, who tells him what the crime is with which he is charged; that the procurator fiscal, who is present, is to ask him questions about his participation in that crime; and that he need not answer them unless he please, but that his answers will be taken down and may be used as evidence against him.” This treatment of a suspected person is certainly opposed to all our English notions of justice and fair play. Why, in the first place, should he be debarred from all advice while undergoing his preliminary examination? Upon what principle should counsel be denied to him when he is before the magistrate and allowed to him when he is before the judge? In truth he has more need of legal advice during the first stage of the proceedings than during the last. He is questioned by the public prosecutor while before the magistrate, but at the trial he undergoes no such ordeal. As to the questioning process of a person suddenly accused and compelled on the moment either to answer everything, or to wear by his silence, at least, the appearance of guilt, it is a species of moral torture which is a standing reproach to the law of Scotland. It may be said that the practice is conducive to the interests of truth, but we have grave doubts upon this point. Guilty persons, and more especially old offenders, often exhibit the utmost coolness and self-possession in courts of justice, while the innocent are as often bewildered and confused, and may by their unguarded answers insure their conviction. Mr. Smith expresses himself strongly upon this blot, as he justly terms it, upon the law of Scotland; and we sincerely trust with him that it will soon be swept away.

Mr. Smith would also follow the example of England in creating a court of criminal appeal. In the absence of such a tribunal he tells us that the criminal law of Scotland is in a state of singular confusion and uncertainty. Indeed, we can hardly understand how such a state of things can continue to exist in any country where law bears the semblance of a science. “One set of judges,” he says, “decide that an attempt to steal is not a crime, and another that an attempt to pick pockets is a crime. The High Court decides that selling a pledged article without authority is not theft, and a judge on circuit lays it down to a jury that it is theft. One judge tells a jury that before they can convict a mother of infanticide, there must be proof of complete living birth, as the judges of England always do, and the woman is acquitted; and another judge does not lay down that law, and, after evidence precisely the same as that on which the other was acquitted, a poor wretch is convicted and sentenced to penal servitude or to death, &c.” If such is the uncertainty of Scotch criminal law, we do not wonder that Mr. Smith should advocate the creation of a court of appeal.

Scotland might also borrow with advantage from England the ancient and important institution of coroners inquests. It has been said, indeed, that these investigations would be superfluous in a country which maintains an efficient staff of public prosecutors. But we have heard Scottish lawyers of experience express a strong opinion to the contrary, and we can easily perceive that in cases of murder the coroner and the public prosecutor might mutually aid each other in arriving at the truth. Upon the whole Scotland has much more to borrow from England with reference to criminal procedure, than England has to borrow from Scotland. If our neighbours can shew us how to establish an efficient system of public prosecutors, we shall be greatly obliged to them. If, on the other hand, they would borrow more largely from our principles of criminal law, create a court of criminal appeal, and introduce coroners inquests, we cannot but think that their system of jurisprudence would be vastly improved.

THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS—(23 & 24 VICT. c. 38).

A brief review of the law of judgments, as it was at the time of the passing of this Act, is indispensable to explain the nature of the changes introduced by the recent statute (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38).

The rights of judgment creditors against the lands of their debtors are wholly statutory, and had no existence at common law, which limited execution to goods and chattels, and to the growing profits of lands. For these the respective writs of execution were those of fiery facias and levari facias. The 13th Edward 1, St. 1, c. 18 (Westminster 2) conferred on judgment creditors their first powers over realty, and enabled them by a writ of elegit to extend one half of the debtor's land, and to hold it until their debt was satisfied out of the produce of the land, according to the estimate of the extent. A judgment thus became a lien upon lands subsequently bought by the debtor, and continued to bind his lands even after their alienation to a purchaser. The statute was passed at a time when the alienation of land was not legal. Hence arose a neglect of the rights of purchasers without notice, after the alienation of land was legalized by the statute quia emptores in the same reign. To obviate this defect in the statute of Westminster 2 has been the chief object of most of the subsequent statutes upon this branch of the law, and the sole aim of the enactment which we are now considering. The confusion into which the law of judgments has run has been owing to the piecemeal and inconsistent legislation to which they have been subjected Judgment creditors have been held not to be purchasers; not to have either jus in re or jus in rem, but a tertium quid, a lien hovering over the estate, the nature of which a purchaser or his lawyer could not understand; but, at the same time, could by no means disregard. The remedy for this anomaly is to treat judgments either as purchases pro tanto, and charges upon lands, of equal force with mortgages, or to rank them as regards land only as simple contract debts. Why should not judgment creditors be protected as purchasers by those who profess to have the interests of purchasers in view? But to those who exclaim against the continuance of such a mode of encumbering land we offer, on the other hand, no opposition. If the law opposes a form of contract which individuals prefer, these will readily discover some other mode of securing their creditors, if not of defeating the supposed statute. What is desirable is certainty in the legal relations of judgment creditor and debtor. Let these relations be extended so as to constitute judgment creditors mortgagees, as is the law in Ireland, or let all the statutes from that of Westminster 2 to the recent Act be repealed. We have no predilections or prejudices in the matter. We desire certainty, or as near an approach to it as reasonable diligence in the work of legislators may produce, and, as a prelude to that desideratum we deprecate all legislation that does not aim at accomplishing somewhat of a consistent harmony of the legal relations which it endeavours to control.

Judgments, as determined in their operation by the statute of Westminster 2, bound freeholds, impropriate rectories and tithes, leaseholds, and reversions. But equitable freeholds, copyholds, advowsons in gross, estates in joint tenancy, and estates tail after the death of the conuzor, unless put in settlement by the tenant in tail after the rendition of the judgment, were not so bound. The writ of elegit under this statute extended only one half of the land. By dividing the debt into two sums, however, and thus taking two judgments of the same term, the entire of the land might be extended. The judgment, however, became a general lien upon all the lands which the debtor owned or possessed, either at the time of the rendition of the judgment, or subsequently; and this lien was so conclusive that it bound the land even after its alienation by the debtor to a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. (2. Cru. Dig. 49.) The guarantees of Jersey, as described ante, vol. iv., p. 905, resemble in their operation the legal powers of judgments, as they were determined by the statute of Westminster 2. The law of judgments, as thus settled, was wholly in favour of the conuzees, and wholly against subsequent purchasers from the conuzor. Upon this point there was no mistake or ambiguity, and so far the statute was valuable. The Statute of Frauds enlarged the rights of judgment creditors, so as to render equitable estates of freehold extendible. But the statute did not apply to equities of redemption, nor to any trusts but such as were clear, nor to trusts of terms.

We now enter upon a review of a series of enactments operating mainly in a different direction, relieving purchasers, and so far injurious to the conuzees, yet only effecting partial and incomplete changes, and, on the whole, injurious as raising an indefinite amount of litigation. The first relief given to purchasers from conuzors of judgments, in contravention of the statute of Westminster, was given by the 14th and 15th sections of the Statute of Frauds, which provided that judgments should be deemed to date, quoad the purchasers from the conuzors, only from the time that they should be signed, and not from the legal date, viz., the first day of the term in which they were recovered. The 16th section of the same statute also relieved the purchasers of goods, under which denomination terms of years in land were held to be comprised, unless execution had been issued prior to the purchase. Attendant terms, however, were of course bound, as interests of a freehold nature, and the 10th section of the same statute bound freehold estates held in trust for the conuzor at the time of execution sued. The Docketing Act of William and Mary was intended to give a quasi relief to purchasers, by facilitating their search for judgments.

We go on to the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110, which applied retrospectively, and extended the rights of the judgment creditor, so as to constitute him a purchaser in every sense, except that he could not avoid the voluntary grants of the conuzor. This Act, by its 11th section, applies to leaseholds, copyholds, customary freeholds, and all other hereditaments, and extends the writ of elegit to the entire of the lands of the conuzee. By the 13th section of this Act, a judgment was also constituted an equitable charge, so as to give the creditor a direct locus standi in equity, and was even rendered binding upon issue in tail and remaindermen, so that a judgment creditor of a tenant in tail was in a better position than the mortgagees of the same, as the latter class of creditors might be defeated by the issue in tail. A judgment had thus a disentailing operation pro tanto. The rights of judgment creditors, therefore, under this statute, appear to have been most complete and conclusive. As the title of a conuzor might be in tail, and not in fee, a judgment ought, in all cases of doubt, during the period of the operation of that statute, to have been regarded as a more indefeasible security than a mortgage. It would appear that, as a will by a tenant in tail is, as to such an estate, inoperative, an estate tail could be virtually disentailed, if expedition were necessary, by the rendition of a judgment equal in value to that of the estate, and by the settlement of the trusts of such a judgment (supposing such to be required). The issue in tail could not avoid the judgment, and the conuzee trustee would be estopped from disputing the rights of his cestuis que trust, and could not avail himself of the benefit of the statute De Donis, issue in tail being the only persons intended to be aided by that statute. Decrees and orders of courts of equity, ordering the payment of sums certain, were, by the 18th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, rendered equally binding in all the foregoing respects with judgments. The 19th section relieved purchasers against all judgments not registered. Judgments of inferior courts were, by the 22nd section of the same Act, rendered of equal force with judgments of the superior courts after being removed into the latter courts, but only when a writ of execution was actually given to the sheriff. The 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, rendered the re-registration of judgments necessary every five years, so as to affect purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors. The 5th section of this Act further secures purchasers, without notice, to such an extent as to repeal, as regards them, the whole of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and to give even to registered judgments against such purchasers only the effect of docketed judgments before that Act. A lis pendens was required by the 7th section of the 2 & 3 Vict., and crown recognizances by the 8th section of the same Act, to be registered, in order to bind purchasers with or without notice.

These enactments, while increasing the remedies of judgment creditors, yet, as they left the other statutes affecting judgments unrepealed, a creditor, if he neglected to register his judgment, as the last statute 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11 required, might, nevertheless, extend half the debtor's land under the statute of Westminster. The law of the registration of judgments, as it stands, operates as a bounty against diligence, for the purchaser is only affected by the registration if he search. If he does not search, he is exempt from all the effects which registration gives a judgment. Of what use then is the law requiring registration? Registration, as a mere ceremony, wants what alone legitimates all legal ceremonies, viz., their tendency to cause deliberation in the minds of the contracting parties, an effect which ceremonies subsequent to the contract cannot have. The Irish law renders registration, both of deeds and judgments, notice to all, and such an effect may have been at first intended by the substitution of registration for docketts. It now acts directly as a tax upon the conuzors. The only merit of the recent Act is that it aims at a simplification of the law of future judgments as to all estates in land, both real and personal. All legal reforms should aim at this abstract assimilation, which alone can render their operation practically useful. The more generic, the less special, our law is, the wider is the natural application of its provisions, and the less likely is it to work mischief in particular cases. Differences in contracts will always, naturally, exist; but the effort of legislation should be to create neither artificial differences nor unnecessary intricacies of its own. Its branches should in number approach as nearly as possible the minor limit of the varieties of the principles of perfect obligation, and this scientific reduction of its features to the harmony of a system, it should endeavour to realize in all its details. There is no essential difference between insolvency and bankruptcy, between commercial and other contracts; there is no difference in the nature of things between conveyances or limitations of estates in land, and incumbrances upon the same. The tenant for life is but an annuitant upon the fee simple. The judgment creditor is essentially of the same character. He is virtually a rent-charger for a term, as he may by an elegit extend the land of his debtor for a term to be computed by the proportion of the yearly value of the land to the amount of the debt. Why, then, should the law create of its own accord rights and remedies which tend to widen the natural differences of the legal relations of different specialty creditors to their debtors? Or why profess to facilitate the deduction of title by complicating the rights of those parties, into whose claims a purchaser must inquire? All changes in the law should be complete, and not only reduce to a common legal measure the legal interests affected, but also endeavour to render that legal measure of the particular class of rights as homogeneous as possible with the other leading branches of the national jurisprudence. If it be only partial it can, of course, have neither recommendation.

The Act which we are considering, leaving the old law untouched as to judgments entered before the 23rd of July, 1860, has so far left all the previous difficulties that beset the conveyancer untouched, while it adds a new set of its own. These, however, as we shall presently endeavour to show, effect nothing very useful. The 1st section of the Act, which recites, "that it is desirable to place freehold, copyhold, and customary estates on the same footing with leasehold estates in respect of judgments, statutes, and recognizances, as against purchasers and mortgagees," enacts "that judgments, statutes, and recognizances, shall not bind lands in the hands of such either with or without notice, unless a writ of execution shall have been issued and registered before the execution of the conveyance, and the payment of the purchase-money," and also unless the said writ be actually executed within three months from the time when it shall have been registered. As the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1854 has required that writs of execution shall not bind the purchasers of goods as to trade, unless the purchaser have notice of the delivery of the writ of execution to the sheriff, so the present Act appears to have aimed at the registration of the execution, to correspond with the notice required by the former Act as to sales of personal chattels. However, registration not being notice, this provision of the statute must be nugatory in this respect. The whole effect of the Act, therefore, is to create expense, which ultimately falls on the borrower, and its whole object could have been attained by an enactment that judgments should be re-registered, not every five years, as hitherto, but every three months, the vexatious absurdity of which is apparent at a glance. Now, surely all judgment creditors will secure their rights as fully as they can, and there is nothing to prevent them from issuing an execution after the entry of the judgment, registering the execution, and re-registering it every three months. To say that such a proceeding would be illegal and contrary to the policy of the statute, is to maintain the absurd alternative that the Act intended that every judgment creditor who dared to issue an execution should elect to put that identical execution in force, or forego his claim altogether, or otherwise, obtain a new judgment, for the consideration of having given time to repay the debt secured by the former one. The effect of this section, then, is to prescribe that executions affecting land be after the first registration re-registered every three months. The Act may thus be wholly neutralised, while it does not apply to judgments entered up before the 23rd July, 1860, nor to the existing law of judgments as regards the conuzor, his volunteers, representatives, or other judgment creditors. A judgment confessed by a tenant in tail will at present, therefore, operate as a disentailing incumbrance against the issue, but not against remaindermen. Such partial legislation cannot be too much discountenanced, and we are sorry that the prestige of Lord St. Leonards' name is lent to such an incomplete performance.

To sum up, a judgment prior to 23rd July, 1860, binds, by force of the statute of Westminster 2 and the Statute of Frauds, half the legal and equitable interest of the conuzor in land even after its alienation to a purchaser without notice; and by force of the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110, a judgment of the same period binds the entire of the conuzor's interest, whether legal, equitable, copyhold, or customary freehold; an estate tail, or an equity of redemption, unless it be aliened to a purchaser without notice, who is protected by a saving clause in the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110, and by the several statutes since passed. A judgment prior to the date mentioned also binds the leaseholds of the conuzor, whether his interest in them be legal or equitable, and all claiming under him, except purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, who are protected by the saving clause in 1 & 2 Vict., c. 110, and by the subsequent enactments, and in their hands the terms cannot be extended, even for a moiety: as, by the several statutes passed since the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 11, the latter statute has been wholly repealed as to this class of purchasers, and the law settled as it stood prior to that statute, viz., as regulated by the Statute of Frauds, which enacted that terms should not be bound until after the delivery of the writ of execution to the sheriff. To this common measure, with the addition of the registration of the writ of execution, is reduced the law of all judgments entered up after the 23rd July, 1860. The Act which is the subject of these observations states in globo that the law of judgments as to freeholds shall be the same as the law that at present regulates the operation of a judgment upon leaseholds. As so far a reduction to uniformity, it deserves praise. But it is only a step in a direction which requires a much more rapid progress; while as it leaves existing judgments unaffected, it cannot aid the deduction of title until all judgments prior to the 23rd July, 1860, shall have become extinguished, a period which we prefer recommending to the contemplation of the astronomer rather than to our readers. Registration is in no case a substitute for notice, although it is indispensable to bind land in the hands of purchasers with notice. It is a formality which has no intrinsic force, and is the mere shadow of what registration should be, viz., notice to all. The 3rd and 4th sections of Lord St. Leonards' Act supply casus omisi in the Registration Act, which did not give heirs and executors the protection afforded by the Docketing Act. When this latter was repealed, an executor became bound to discharge all judgment debts, of which he might not have had notice, in priority to simple contract debts. These sections, however, afford no room for comment, as illustrating no general principle, except that, in this respect, registration operates as notice.

It is a curious coincidence that so much litigation has been occasioned by two statutes passed in the same session of a reign so remote as that of Edward I.; yet all family settlements are at this day based upon the statute De Donis Conditionalibus, 13th Edward I., c. 1, a statute which originated fines, recoveries, and an indefinite amount of legal difficulty, both as to deeds and wills, while the difficulties which beset judgments, a statutory product of the same Parliament, we need not repeat. If entails were reduced to ordinary freeholds, as base fees, that is, if the statute De Donis were repealed, and if all the statutes relating to the operation of judgments upon realty were in like manner wholly repealed, we should be saved much of the trouble that is occasioned at present by the diligence of our legislators in repairing these ancient bulwarks of the legal art.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Sittings in Banco, before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, and Justices HILL and BLACKBURN.)

Nov. 19.—Ex parte Crawshay.—This was an application on the part of George Crawshay, for a rule calling upon John Baxter Langley, the proprietor and publisher of the Daily Chronicle and Newcastle Advertiser, to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for certain misdemeanours. Mr. Crawshay had formerly been Mayor of Gateshead, and the present application was made by him against Mr. Langley in consequence of certain articles which had appeared in his newspaper, in the month of August last, to procure persons in England to enlist in the army of General Garibaldi, and for other acts done by him for the purpose of inciting persons to enter into the service of the General.

Mr. Boeill, Q.C., who appeared for the applicant, having made a few preliminary observations, Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN interposed, and inquired whether this was a case in which it was competent for a private person to come forward and ask for the interposition of the Court. Was there any precedent for the application? If it was an offence, it was an offence against the State, and it was for the Attorney-General to take it up; but his lordship said he never heard of a private person coming forward to make such an application, founded on an article in a newspaper.

After some discussion between the learned counsel and the Court,

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN said this was a case of a private individual applying to the Court, but there was no precedent for the interference of this Court by criminal information in such a case; and that the Court ought not to grant a criminal information at his instance, but leave him to the ordinary remedy of the law. The applicant might bring the matter under the attention of her Majesty's law officers, who would decide whether it was necessary to interfere. But all this Court said was, that they could not grant a criminal information at the instance of a private individual; but he must be left to prefer his bill of indictment, or to take some other proceedings.

Mr. Justice HILL and Mr. Justice BLACKBURN being of the same opinion, the rule was refused.

Nov. 23.—Ex parte Lieutenant Allen.—This was an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The circumstances of the case are stated ante, p. 4.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that, unless it were shown that the prisoner had been removed under the order of the proper officer, as required by the 41st section of the Mutiny Act, namely, the officer commanding the district garrison, or colony, they would be bound in law to discharge him. On this state of the facts, the Court doubted not that Lieutenant Allen was illegally in prison, and must be discharged. The Court was clearly of opinion that this imprisonment could not be legally maintained. If, however, the learned Solicitor-General could show that any proper authority for the removal of Mr. Allen had been given, this decision would not be final.

The Solicitor-General said he had no reason to believe that he could produce any such authority.

COURT OF PROBATE AND DIVORCE.

(Before Sir C. CRESSWELL.)

Nov. 21.—Allen v. Allen and D'Arcy.—In this case a jury had found that Mrs. Allen, the respondent, had been guilty of adultery, but that the petitioner had connived at the adultery, and that he had been a party to a conspiracy against the respondent, and the Court therefore dismissed his petition with costs. The costs having been taxed by the Registrar, a rule nisi was obtained on behalf of the respondent for a review of that taxation, on the ground that the common law principle of taxation as between party and party, upon which the Registrar had proceeded, was not applicable to the costs of a matrimonial suit.

Cause having been shown against the rule,

The learned JUDGE said the taxation must certainly be reviewed. In taxing costs in matrimonial suits the Court was bound to adopt, as far as it could, the principles formerly acted on in the ecclesiastical courts. He was informed that in those courts the principle of taxation as between party and party was adopted, but the words as "between party and party" had a very different construction in those courts from that which was placed upon them in the common law courts. In the common law courts costs only of those issues which were found in favour of the parties receiving them were allowed, but he thought that the only limitation which could with propriety be put upon the allowance of the costs of different issues raised in this court must be that where the taxing-officer was satisfied that an issue had been vexatiously put on the record, he should not allow the costs of that issue. The number of witnesses called to prove a particular fact, for whom an allowance was to be made, was a question for the discretion of the Registrar, and must depend upon the question whether there was reasonable ground for calling them. The expenses of the journeys of witnesses for the purposes of identification, and of other matters were not allowed in the common law courts. He thought it desirable that in cases of this nature the rule of the ecclesiastical courts should be followed, and allowances should be made for the expenses of necessary journeys. The taxation would be sent back to the Registrar to be reviewed upon these principles.

Arrears of Business.—His Lordship mentioned, in disposing of an application to fix a time for the trial of a probate cause, that there were 200 petitions for dissolution of marriage now set down for hearing, besides a large number of judicial separation suits, and rather a long list of probate causes.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

The November adjourned General Sessions of the Peace for the county of Middlesex commenced on the 19th instant, at the Guildhall, Broad Sanctuary, Westminster, before Mr. Bodkin, assistant judge, Mr. Payne, deputy, and several magistrates.

The Assistant-Judge delivered the charge to the grand jury.

Mr. Edwin Hooper, of West Bromwich, one of the coroners for the county of Stafford, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Stafford; and also a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

The following gentlemen were called to the bar on Saturday, the 17th inst.:—

Lincoln's Inn.—Henry Selfe Page Winterbotham, Esq., London, LL.B. (certificate, first class); Daniel Alexander Freeman, Esq. (certificate of honour, first-class); Thomas Wilkinson John Dent, Esq., M.A., Cambridge; Alfred Henry Say Stonhouse Vigor, Esq., B.A., late of Cambridge; Robert Allan Fitzgerald, Esq., B.A., Cambridge; the Hon. John Byrne Leicester Warren, B.A., Oxford; Edward James Athawes, Esq., B.A., Cambridge; Thomas Bonville Were, Esq.; George Charles, Esq., late of Oxford; Francis Noel Mundy, Esq.; George Dickson Atkinson, Esq.; Henry Colville Marindin, Esq., B.A., Oxford; Edward F. A'Beckett, Esq.; Horatio Henry Shirley, Esq., B.A., Cambridge; Farrer Herschell, Esq., B.A., London; John Giles Pilcher, Esq.; Matthew Pilcher, Esq.; Samuel Thomas Staughton, Esq.; Henry Stuart Drewry, Esq., M.A., Cambridge, and George Parker Bidder, jun., Esq., B.A., Cambridge.

Inner Temple.—Wm. Rolles Fryer, Esq., B.A.; Fred. Sam. Child, Esq.; Henry Thos. Braithwaite, Esq., M.A.; Rd. Battye, Esq., B.A.; Archibald Levin Smith, Esq., B.A.; Robert Marsden Latham, Esq., Harry Tichbourne Davenport, Esq., M.A.; Joshua Dean, Esq.; Frederick Bridgman, Esq.; Joseph Hartley, Esq.; Henry Francis Gillett, Esq.; M.A.; and John Henry William Fenton, Esq., M.A.

Middle Temple.—Edward Bullen, of 2, Brick-court, Temple, Esq.; George Burnett Barton, of Sydney, Esq.; Christopher James Davison, Ingledew, of Northallerton, Esq.; George Frederick Robinson Jervis, of Exeter College, Oxford, Esq.; Cornelius Walford, of 1, Elm-court, Temple, Esq.; and Clement James Wolseley, of Castletown, county of Carlow, Esq.

EQUITY.

PRACTICE—ADMINISTRATION SUITS.

Penney v. Francis, 9 W. R., M. R., 8.

The practice in administration suits where two or more bills have been filed by creditors for the administration of the same estate, was very unsettled until recently, and there was considerable doubt as to the course which ought to be adopted for the purpose of staying unnecessary suits. Lord Cranworth, however, in the case of Duffort v. Arrowsmith, 7 De G. M. & G. 434, s.c. 5 W. R. 241, considered that the proper course of proceeding in such a case was that the Lord Chancellor or Lords Justices (see Consol. Ord. vi., R. 1) should transfer the cause in which no decree for administration had been made to the branch of the court in which such decree had been made; so that the judge who had made the decree could, if he thought proper, stay proceedings in the transferred cause. It should be borne in mind, however, that the consent of the judge from whose, and of the judge to whose court, it is proposed to transfer the cause, ought to be obtained. Previously to the decision in Duffort v. Arrowsmith, the cases conflicted upon the point whether where a decree had been made in one suit, and none in the other, the judge in the latter suit, or the judge in the former, should be called upon to stay all further proceedings in the suit in which no decree had been made. The general order above referred to appears to favour the view of those who argue that a judge of one court of equity ought not to have the power to prevent the prosecution of a suit before another judge; but this difficulty is altogether removed by adopting the course suggested by Lord Cranworth in Duffort v. Arrowsmith, and applying for the transfer of the cause as above-mentioned. A more recent case of Harris v. Gandg, 8 W. R. 32, before the full Court of Appeal, is, however, to the effect that where a decree has been first obtained by means of an unfair advantage, the Court will refuse to transfer another suit for administration of the same estate, to the court where a decree has been obtained. The case named at the head of these observations was one in which there had been three suits by creditors for the administration of the same estate, two before the Master of the Rolls, and one before one of the Vice-Chancellors; and in one of the former the usual order was made at chambers on the day before an order was made by the Vice-Chancellor in the suit before him. Upon an application on behalf of a creditor to the Master of the Rolls, to restrain the drawing up of the Vice-Chancellor's order, his Honour refused to make any other order than to give the creditor leave to transfer into the Rolls Court any cause which the Vice-Chancellor might think right. The following observations of his Honour in this case are worthy of attention with regard to the conduct of causes of this kind. "He was not in the habit of giving facilities to strangers to the estate—creditors for instance—having the conduct of such causes, because they were generally regardless of expense. He much preferred to give their conduct to residuary legatees, who were interested in reducing the expenses as much as possible; all other persons being at liberty to attend and assert their claims. It was very important that administration suits should be conducted in a friendly spirit."

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—LONDON AGENT—LIEN.

Waller v. Holmes, V. C. W., 9 W. R., 32.

In Waller v. Holmes, Vice-Chancellor Wood has decided that where a client has paid his country solicitor in a suit his bill of costs, papers belonging to the client in the hands of London agents cannot be retained by them for the amount due to them in the suit. His Honour's decision appears to have proceeded upon the ground that there is no privity between the client and the London agent, so as to give the latter any right of lien as against the client; and that as the country solicitor, when he was paid his bill, could not enforce such lien, neither could the town agent do so. Some dicta of judges at common law (namely, per Bayley, J. Moody v. Spencer, 2 Dow. & Ry. 8, and per Coleridge, J., in Anderson v. Passman, 7 Carr. & P. 796), are to the same effect as the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in Waller v. Holmes. There appears to be, however, some difficulty in the way of the conclusion that there is no privity between a client in the country and the London agent of the country solicitor. The name of the London agent is upon the record, and for all purposes of the suit his acts bind the client as effectually as if the agent were directly employed by the client. There is no doubt, however, that it is pretty well settled that on the one hand the country solicitor alone and not the client is liable to the agent for his bill of costs, and on the other the client cannot proceed in a summary manner against the agent as he could against his own solicitor. At the same time it may be doubted whether upon the principle of the doctrine of lien a town agent should be compelled to relinquish the possession of papers which came properly into his possession, and which he clearly would have been entitled to retain, but for the act of a party between whom and the town agent there was ex hypothesi no privity. If the client requires of his country solicitor the delivery up of papers on the payment of the bill of costs, and is unable to obtain them by reason of their being in the possession of the town agent, that would be a reason for refusing to pay the bill of costs; and so long as it remains unpaid the lien of the town agent remains good; but it appears unreasonable to enable a client to defeat this lien, it may be merely for the advantage of the country solicitor or his creditors.

A case of Hughes v. Rogers, mentioned in the note in the 8th vol. of Mr. Beavan's Reports, 487, seems to be an authority for the proposition that a town agent in a suit may obtain a stop order on a sum directed to be paid to the country solicitor.

COMMON LAW.

THE NEW ATTORNIES' AND SOLICITORS' ACT—COUNTIES PALATINE, PRACTITIONERS IN.

Ex parte Watson; Ex parte Abbott, 9 W. R. Q. B. 13.

It so happens that the very first case reported from the Queen's Bench in the present volume of the Weekly Reporter, raises a point of some interest upon the Solicitors' and Attorneys' Act of last session. It is the following one:—

By the Act of 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73) it is provided (s. 43) that all persons duly admitted and enrolled attorneys or solicitors of the courts of the counties palatine, previously to the date of that statute, might be admitted and enrolled as solicitors or attorneys in the High Court of Chancery or the superior courts of law at Westminster, in pursuance of the provisions of that Act, without examination, on payment of the proper duty. The effect of this provision was tested in the same year in which the Act was passed, in the case of Patrick (1 D. & L. 696), a practitioner in the county palatine of Durham, and the application to admit him, not only without examination, but also without requiring a term's notice of his intention to apply, was granted by Mr. Justice Patteson without any hesitation: There is also another clause in the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, which refers to attorneys of the counties palatine, viz., sect. 3; the concluding part of which exempts any such attorney or solicitor from the examination required from other candidates for admission and enrolment in the superior courts of Westminster, provided he has duly served the full period under articles, and provided also he shall satisfy the judges of the superior courts at Westminster of his being qualified to act as attorney or solicitor.

Such being the state of the law up to the passing of the late Act, there are inserted therein two clauses which affect the status of the county palatine practitioners. The 13th section establishes for the first time the requirement of examination as well as of due service under articles, before any person can be admitted and enrolled as an attorney of a county palatine court. On the other hand, the 14th section recognizes the right already existing under the previous statute, and extends it so as to include any person duly admitted and enrolled in the county palatine courts prior to Trinity term, 1861, and allows such persons to be admitted and enrolled, in the superior courts at Westminster without examination.

As to the future, therefore, there seems to be no great room for question. The evident intention of the new Act is to ensure that the county palatine practitioners shall be subjected (as they manifestly ought to be), to the same strictness of examination as other candidates; and it is therefore somewhat difficult to understand the observations of the court (as reported), which would appear to throw some doubt as to this being the effect of the new Act. The immediate question before them, however, was as to whether a "term's notice" was required from one who was qualified by the date of his admission and enrolment in the county palatine courts, to make the application for admission and enrolment in the courts at Westminster. No such notice seems to have been required under the previous Act, and the judges refused to impose any such necessity on the present applicants.

BILLS OF SALE, AFFIDAVITS RESPECTING—DESCRIPTION, REQUIREMENTS OF.

Dryden v. Hope, 9 W. R., Exch. 18.

In two recent cases in the Court of Exchequer, the necessary points in the affidavit of an attesting witness of a bill of sale under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36, have undergone considerable discussion, and the state of the decisions upon this subject, in the other courts, carefully sifted. The first of the two cases above referred to is that of Pickard v. Bretz (5 H. & N. 9), which established that under the Act, the affidavit of execution itself must describe the occupation of the party giving the security, and that an affidavit defective in this respect is not aided by the occupation of the grantor being fully set forth in the bill of sale, though to that instrument the affidavit expressly refers. For the Act requires three things to be stated in the affidavit itself. 1. The date of the security given. 2. The residence of the party giving it. 3. His occupation. And the omission of any one of those is fatal.

The other case is that of Wilcoxon v. Searby (29 L. J. Ex. 154), which shows on the other hand, that a positive allegation in the affidavit that the occupation of the grantor is so and so, is not essential, provided the affidavit recites and incorporates the occupation given in the bill of sale.

The question raised, however, in the present case was not as to the sufficiency of the statement of the occupation of the grantor of the security, but as to the sufficiency of the description of the attesting witness in the affidavit of execution. The description relied on was simply that the instrument was attested by one "W., of Y., Gentleman," the attesting witness describing himself in the attestation clause of the instrument as being clerk to one "T., solicitor of B., in the county of Y." The description thus given in the affidavit of execution was held insufficient according to the principle of the first of the above cases. For the description itself being bad (no residence being given) could not be helped out by the good description contained in the attestation clause of the bill of sale; which the affidavit of execution did not recite and incorporate in itself, as was done in the other case of Wilcoxon v. Searby. As to the sufficiency of the description of an attesting witness (being an attorney in practice) as "gentleman" if his residence be properly added, see Tuson v. Sunoni (6 W. R., Exch. 545).

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STATUS OF MAYOR—5 & 6 W. 4, c. 76, s. 97.

Ex parte Mayor of Birmingham, 9 W. R., 34.

The question raised in this case was by no means an unimportant one, nor was it (as is submitted) at all free from doubt. Yet it was dismissed by the Queen's Bench without any argument whatever; and a decision given by that Court which, whether right or wrong, will, as it becomes known throughout the country, produce confusion if not unseemly quarrels in many provincial towns.

The 57th section of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) provides for the status of the mayor of each borough. It makes this officer (unless otherwise disqualified) a magistrate during office, and for a year afterwards, and it then proceeds to enact that, "such mayor shall, during the time of his mayoralty, have precedence in all places within the borough." The meaning which common usage has hitherto attached to those words, has been that the mayor as such is entitled to preside at all meetings in the borough, whether of magistrates to administer justice, or of the corporation for the transaction of borough business; and indeed he usually takes the chair at all public meetings whatever held in the borough. The Court of Queen's Bench, however, decided in this case, that the precedence thus accorded him, so far as regards the meetings of the magistrates, at all events, (for with regard to meetings for the transaction of borough business other than magisterial, the Court does not express an opinion) is merely by way of courtesy; and that the only precedence in the borough to which he is entitled by law is a social precedence, whatever that may import. According to this decision, therefore, a mayor is no longer the chief magistrate of his town; though to whom that title more properly belongs it seems difficult to pronounce an opinion. It may be observed that by sect. 103 of the same Act, in any borough which has a separate quarter sessions, the recorder of such borough "shall have precedence in all places within the borough of which he may be the recorder next after the mayor thereof." It is very difficult to suppose that this provision, also, refers merely to precedence at social parties and the like; and yet if there be no magisterial precedence in the case of the mayor, what is to become of that of the recorder, which depends on that of his superior official?

Correspondence.

THE ATTORNEYS' AND SOLICITORS' ACT, 1860.

Supposing a barrister has been called ten years, but has never practised, and then is disbarred, and has been an attorney one hour, is he or not (under the 16th section) eligible for the Solicitorship to the Ordnance, the post of taxing master, or any other office? It seems to me he is. X. Y. Z.

THE COMMON LAW—JUDGES' CHAMBERS AND MASTERS.

I observe a letter in your impression of the 17th, from which it is to be inferred that a gentleman who calls himself "A Constant Reader," is of opinion that the masters are hard worked and unable to afford the time to assist the judges by disposing of minor summonses, as suggested by one or more of your correspondents. All I can say is, that of the Queen's Bench masters only two could be found in attendance for several days after the long vacation had terminated—at last a third was found, and I conclude a fourth was in court. As three are recent appointments, there was the less reason for their absence. Only last Tuesday, one who had made several special appointments before him was not to be met with when one was attended and another master declined to take it in his absence. A COMMON LAW CLERK.

PROTECTION FROM ARREST.

Referring to the article in the Solicitors' Journal of the 10th instant, on this subject you will, I am sure, allow me to make a few observations on the practical working of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 147, which extends the Gentleman's Act to Debtors in actual custody. You say in your excellent remarks, "that arrest and imprisonment for debt are still the law of the land," but it seems to me that the Act alluded to has been passed for the purpose of eluding those laws, and to enable a dishonest man to cheat his creditors; for, under the provisions of this Act, the creditors whose names are inserted in the petition of the debtor are not required (as in all other proceedings in the Court of Bankruptcy) to make oath of the debts due to them before voting for the petitioner; but the debtor having inserted their names in his petition, and without even the petitioner swearing to the truth of his petition, the creditors may out of court assent to the proposal, and sign an authority to vote, and the debtor is thus enabled to obtain his end, protection from arrest. The practical working of this measure, therefore, is, that a non-trader owing, say £1000, to creditors who have probably proceeded to judgment, imagines he owes £2,500 to certain other persons. A petition with a proposal to pay probably 2s. 6d. in the pound, is prepared, signed by the friendly creditors, no proof of debt nor oath of petitioner being necessary, and presented to the Court. The Court, considering the creditors the best judges of the proposal, forthwith confirms it, and the unfortunate bona fide creditors are sacrificed.

Surely creditors are entitled to some protection as well as debtors.

A. S. M.

The Provinces.

BRISTOL.—At the opening of the police court at Lawford's Gate on Thursday the 15th inst., the Rev. W. Mirehouse being the only magistrate present, Mr. P. Edlin, barrister, applied for the adjournment of an affiliation case, in which he was engaged as counsel for the defendant, in order that the attendance of certain witnesses for the defence might be procured. It appeared that Mr. Mirehouse had been applied to at his private residence for summonses for these witnesses, and (as stated by Mr. Edlin) had declined to grant them. Mr. Mirehouse, however, denied that he had refused to grant the summonses. The application for the adjournment was made in order that those summonses might be issued. Mr. Edlin then applied for the summonses, and having again asserted that it was for the purpose of bringing together witnesses, who but for his (Mr. Mirehouse's) refusal to grant summonses, would have been present, and also expressed an opinion that such refusal was not consistent with the usual legal course, the following altercation ensued between the bench and the counsel:

Mr. Mirehouse.—I am surprised that a gentleman should so contradict me. I say I never did refuse the summons; but what I did was this:—A person brought a summons to my house, where I am not obliged to do anything, and wished it to be signed and issued by me then. He said it was to summon a person whom he believed to have had some connexion with the girl. I said, "Sir, it is a perilous course." He then said, "If I get a party who will prove that he had a connexion with her, that will put an end to the whole affair, won't it?" I then ordered him out of my house.

Mr. Edlin.—You forget to state that you were about to sign the summons. If you were about—

Mr. Mirehouse.—I am not to be cross-examined by you—

Mr. Edlin.—But—

Mr. Mirehouse.—Be kind enough to hold your tongue.

Mr. Edlin.—You told me that you were on the point of signing the summons, and that you desired him to leave your house. I say that that is a refusal.

Mr. Mirehouse.—I did not refuse.

Mr. Edlin.—You must have refused, or—

Mr. Mirehouse.—I am not going to argue with you.

Mr. Edlin.—You are so intemperate, sir, that professional gentlemen find it difficult to present anything to you in a courteous spirit. You may forget what is due from you as a magistrate sitting on that bench, but I shall not forget what is due from me as counsel in this case.

Mr. Mirehouse.—You do forget. You are the only barrister, and I have had scores—I have had Mr. Stone times out of number to appear in cases that I have heard—that ever I had an unpleasant word with, but you think that you are going to direct and dictate as you think proper.

Mr. Edlin.—I venture to say there is not one of your brother magistrates who would say that of me.

Mr. Mirehouse.—I do say that you choose to dictate to the Court in an arbitrary way.

Mr. Edlin.—I find it necessary to keep you in order.

Mr. Mirehouse.—That you shall not do; and I will not adjourn the case.

Mr. Edlin.—Then I will wait till your brother magistrates are here.

Mr. Mirehouse.—I will not adjourn the case, if I sit here till four o'clock.

The learned counsel here left the court, and was absent for a short time. On his return he made another application for the summonses, but again failed; he then left the court, but shortly afterwards returned and said, "I wish before retiring from this case, which I am now about to do, to state that, not having succeeded in obtaining those summonses, which we are by law entitled to, notwithstanding repeated applications made for them, I, and those connected with me in the case, are about to retire at this stage of the proceedings, and we shall seek our remedy in a superior court." Mr. Edlin, accompanied by Mr. Clifton, his client, then withdrew. Mr. Mirehouse was afterwards joined by another magistrate, and the case was gone into in the absence of the defendant; the magistrates eventually deciding against him with costs. At the conclusion of the case Mr. Mirehouse observed that had the case stood, as, but for the retirement of the parties for the defence it would have stood, he should have been prepared to give a very different judgment.

HUDDERSFIELD.—On the 19th instant the tenant-right holders on the estates of Sir John Ramsden held another aggregate meeting at which, amongst others, the following resolution was proposed and carried without dissent:—"That the stringency of the covenants and conditions necessarily contained in the proposed ninety-nine years' lease, added to the fact that those who have erected edifices under the unquestionable conviction and positive assurance that they were 'never to be disturbed in their possession,' are to be evicted without compensation or equivalent at the termination of 99 years, render any satisfactory settlement of the question between Sir John William Ramsden and the tenant-right owners, under the 'Ramsden Estate Leasing Act, 1859,' wholly impossible; and that, considering the position and circumstances of the tenant-right owners, brought to light through the operations and exertions of the Tenant-right Defence Association, this meeting is of opinion that no lease satisfactorily acceptable to the tenant-right owners can be offered by Sir J. W. Ramsden, except on the basis of a 999 years' term." The tenant-right holders have entrusted the protection of their interests to the Chairman of the "Defence Association."

NEWCASTLE.—The necessity for the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate to conduct the business of the borough police court was clearly exemplified by the condition of that court on the morning of the 12th inst. On that morning the prisoners, the attorneys, the clerks, the police, the reporters, and the public were kept waiting above an hour because one of the magistrates on the rota was absent. In the meantime messengers were running all over the town in search of a magistrate qualified and willing to act. The first that made his appearance was Mr. Alderman Laycock, who was willing but unqualified; and the next was a county gentleman, who was duly qualified but unwilling. Lastly came Mr. Plummer the absentee, and at twenty minutes past noon the business which ought to have commenced at eleven o'clock was proceeded with. It is stated that this is not the first time that the proceedings of the court have been delayed by the absence of magistrates.

STOCKTON.—At the next council meeting several gentlemen will be proposed as additional magistrates for this borough to be recommended by the council to the Lord Chancellor for his approval.

WALES.—PWLLHELI.—At a meeting of the town council of this borough, held on the 9th instant, Mr. Griffith Thomas Picton Jones, solicitor, was unanimously elected mayor for the ensuing year.

Reviews.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c.126), with practical notes; and an Introduction explanatory of the new equitable powers conferred on the Courts of Law; and of the Alteration in Procedure and Practice effected by the Statute. By JAMES STEPHEN, Esq., LL.D., Recorder of Poole; Editor of "Lush's Common Law Practice." Butterworths, 1860.

An edition of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, by Mr. Stephen, can hardly fail to be a useful contribution to our current legal literature. The work now before us, moreover, comprises a valuable introduction to the statute, in which Mr.

Stephen gives an account of the Common Law Commission 1850, and of its several reports, having regard especially to the fusion of law and equity, as contemplated in the Law and Equity Bill presented to the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor last Session, and which after the vigorous opposition which its "fusion" clauses there evoked eventually subsided into the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860. Although it is in this shape of comparatively slender importance, instead of being one of the greatest reforms of the law ever adopted by Parliament—as its noble author characterized the Bill before its fate was ascertained—there are nevertheless in the Act as it passed many provisions of great importance to those engaged in the practice of the law. Mr. Stephen has appended to most of the sections some valuable observations showing the effect of the new enactments upon the law as it formerly stood. We can recommend this edition of the Act, as being carefully and well done.

The Practice of the Court of Probate in Common Form Business. By HENRY CHARLES COOTE, F.S.A., Proctor in Doctors' Commons, author of "The Practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts," &c., &c. Also, A Treatise on the Practice of the Court in Contentious Business. By THOMAS H. TRISTRAM, D.C.L., Advocate in Doctors' Commons, and of the Inner Temple. Third Edition. Butterworths, 1860.

The fact that an entire edition of a law book has been sold in the course of a year is the best commendation of its merits. The second edition of the work, the title of which is given above, was published only last year, and as it is well known to the profession as a very compendious and reliable manual of the practice of the Court of Divorce, it is not necessary that we should attempt any detailed account of it. The new edition contains about eighty pages of additional matter, and includes all the statutes, rules, and orders to the present time, together with a collection of original forms and bills of costs. The general division is into the two heads of non-contentious, or common form, and contentious business, Mr. Coote taking the former subject, and Dr. Tristram the latter. Both these gentlemen have accomplished their book in a manner altogether satisfactory. There are about a hundred pages of precedents for common form business, being a very large increase in the portion of the work devoted to this branch.

THE ABOLITION OF OATHS.

The following paper on the Abolition of Oaths and the Substitution of an Affirmation in all Cases, was read by Mr. C. A. Smith, of Greenwich, at the late Meeting of this Association:—

It is a satisfactory indication of the general prevalence of religious feeling at the present day, that whenever any important alteration is suggested in our laws having any bearing, however remote, upon religious or moral considerations, the first inquiry to which all minds are directed is the teaching of the Holy Scriptures on the subject. The question "What is written in the law—how readest thou?" must be answered ere the discussion is permitted to take a wider range, and when due allowance is made for the various circumstances attending the cited example which may detract from its value as an authority on the particular subject of comparison, such a course is wise and profitable; for if the Scriptures of truth speak with no uncertain sound upon any question of doubt, we can have no better sanction for our guidance; while, on the other hand, if the holy oracle be silent, or vague, we can only legitimately refer to it by way of analogy, and not as a dogmatical exposition beyond the scope of argument.

As to the lawfulness of oaths in courts of justice, whatever reliance may be placed by the quakers and other literal interpreters of Scripture upon the words "Swear not at all," an injunction having evidently by the context no reference to judicial oaths, but merely to the indiscriminate and unnecessary use of oaths on ordinary occasions, there are sufficient instances related in the Bible of adjurations for judicial and other purposes to justify the supporters of the existing practice in quoting Scripture in its favour. These instances are scattered throughout the sacred writings, and consist mostly of references implying the existence of the custom of swearing, rather than giving any special directions on the subject, or prescribing any particular ceremonies with which the act was to be accompanied; thus, under the Jewish law as laid down in the 6th chapter of Leviticus, a trespass offering is required of him who may "have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely." Again, at an earlier period of Jewish history, when Abraham commissioned his servant to seek a wife for his son Isaac among the patriarch's kindred in Mesopotamia, the ceremony of an oath is set forth with great distinctness and particularity; "Put I pray thee thy hand under my thigh, and I will make thee swear by the Lord the God of heaven and the God of the earth. . . . and the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and sware to him concerning that matter." The iniquitous proceedings of Jezebel in working the destruction of Naboth (although no specific mention is made of an oath) discloses the mode then in use of conducting judicial proceedings, the two men wickedly suborned by the queen's subservient ministers for the purpose being represented as set before the accused in the presence of the people, to give evidence on the false charge of blasphemy.

And on the solemn arraignment of our Lord before the high priest on a similar charge, two false witnesses are in like manner brought forward to secure an unjust conviction; and it is remarkable that on that occasion the high priest himself tendered the oath of expurgation in a settled form of words—"I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell me whether thou be the Christ," and the answer appears to be framed upon the model of the usual reply to such a summons from an authorised functionary, "Thou hast said."

It is, however, not necessary to insist further upon scriptural authority, as while it may be admitted that a sanction is to be found in the Bible for the practice of swearing on proper occasions, no one will be hardy enough to assert that it is anywhere prescribed as a matter of duty, or of universal obligation.

In addition to the authority for oaths to be derived from the teaching or silence of scripture, the customs of all nations in all times may no doubt be quoted in favour of the practice, and these preliminary admissions are made in order to disembarass the subject from any considerations other than those connected with grounds of social necessity and expediency.

Trying the matter then by this standard, the question arises, Is the practice of swearing as at present sanctioned by our laws necessary or expedient with reference to the general security and well-being of the community at large?

The recent abolition of oaths in connection with many matters not of a judicial character, and the substitution of a solemn declaration, while it has placed on record a Parliamentary admission of the policy of abolishing unnecessary oaths, has at the same time done much towards remedying the evils which formerly existed in this respect; but the practice still prevails in courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, as well as in matters relating to the customs, excise, taxes, and other subjects of an extra-judicial character.

It is argued by the supporters of the present system that the abolition of the ceremony of an oath in all cases would unsettle the minds of weak and ignorant persons, and induce many whose moral perceptions are not very clear or delicate to indulge in simple untruth, when they would shrink from incurring the responsibility of breaking an oath, to which early associations and long habit have attached a superstitious reverence.

A few such instances might probably occur at first, although it may well be doubted whether in general the individual who would deliberately, from some corrupt motive, utter an untruth, would be deterred therefrom by a religious scruple or by any stronger inducement than the apprehension of detection and punishment, and in the event of oaths being abolished, the penal consequences of untruth would of course remain; a conviction of falsehood being followed by the penalties for perjury. Is it, however, fair to the sensitive and truth-speaking Christian to impose upon him a painful ceremony, in order that the ignorant and superstitious may be, like children, frightened into veracity; and, on the other hand, is it wise or expedient, as regards the latter class, to preserve a system fitted for a barbarous age, and thereby keep their minds depressed to the ancient level of superstitious dread, instead of enlightening their intellects, and imbuing them with the right principles upon which a due regard to truth at all times and on all occasions, great or small, important or trivial, should be based?

It would be out of place to dwell upon the various modes and ceremonies by which men's consciences are supposed to be influenced against the temptations to falsehood in different countries, and which, in the case of foreigners, are not unfrequently exhibited in our courts of justice, whether this ceremony consist in breaking a tea-cup, as with the Chinese, or be accompanied by putting on the hat, as in the case of the Jews; and however we may feel struck with the apparent absurdity of such practices, we should not forget that the act of kissing a book appears, doubtless, to those whose corresponding usages we deride, as equally worthy of ridicule from their point of view. With reference to this branch of the subject, the practical irreverence of our own system is vividly portrayed in the pungent lines of a member of the legal profession (Anstey) in his Bath Guide:—

"Here, Simon; you shall—silence, there!
The truth, and nothing but the truth, declare;
The truth, and all the truth, be willing To speak. So help you—a shilling!"

If this quotation be not remarkable for reverential feeling, it should be remembered that the irreverence is chargeable to the practice thus wittily described, and not to the satirist. If it be an unexaggerated representation of the practice, the objectionable lineaments are not attributable to the mirror, which only too truly reflects the features of the original.

In suggesting an alteration of a law and practice which have existed from time immemorial, it may be fairly urged that the onus of proof of the necessity and expediency of the change lies upon the author of the suggestion, and that the advocates of the continuance of the present system may content themselves with the prescriptive authority derived from ancient usage.

But this general liability is much weakened in the present instance, by the fact that the existing system is wanting in that integrity and universality which would entitle it to plead the claim of uninterrupted usage.

It is really a mere fragment, and when a deduction is made for the numbers claiming exemption from its operation, as Quakers and Moravians, and that large and increasing class who, entertaining conscientious scruples as to taking oaths, shelter themselves under the provisions of the recent acts on the subject, the members of the community who will remain under the degrading stigma of being unworthy of belief save when subject to the religious duress of an appeal to the Divine Being, cannot be quoted as the representatives of a system alleged to be sacred and unalterable, on the ground of antiquity and unvarying custom.

Does not the present partial system involve the inconsistency that, while those who cannot take advantage of our exceptive laws in this respect are subjected to the ceremony of appealing to the Divine Being as a test of their truthfulness, other persons, however loose their religious or moral principles, are admitted to legal credibility upon a mere individual declaration? This course of proceeding offers a premium to dissent from established institutions, and it is a fact that before the passing of the last Oaths Relief Act some persons were induced to continue within the pale of Quakerism for the express purpose of enjoying the immunity from taking oaths in courts of justice, which that profession secured to them.

If urged to specify any particular instances of mischief arising out of the existing practice, it may be difficult to answer the appeal, because the influences of such laws and usages is not open to general observation, and is incapable of being illustrated, like many other questions, by the quotation of a case in point. Its influence is subtle, and in a sense speculative, but it is not the less real, nor less appreciable by those who watch closely the improving progress which is now rapidly making in the moral and religious sentiments of the community.

The retention of merely material forms and ceremonies appealing to the grosser elements of our intellectual constitution, and founded upon a basis of superstitious adherence to certain outward acts, however fitted for a primitive state of civilization, must tend to retard the gradual improvement of the spiritual and moral perceptions, and prevent their attaining that sensitiveness which has a beneficial co-action upon all the best faculties of man, and the only question appears to be whether, after what has been already done in the way of abolishing the ceremony of swearing, the time has not arrived to fill up the complement of the measure by substituting an affirmation for an oath in all cases, without any exception. It may be said that the entire abolition of oaths has not been advocated by judges and other functionaries engaged in the administration of justice, but it is no less true than trite, that those employed in any special pursuit are the last to see and admit the objections and anomalies which are apparent to others who look on without any professional bias; and one benefit to be derived from the proposed abolition of swearing in courts of law would be the cessation of that painful mode of confusing a witness now often resorted to by reiterating to him the insulting remark, "Now, remember, sir, you are upon your oath."

It may also be said that, as in most of our national improvements, a gradual course of partial alteration from time to time should be adopted in this matter, so as not to shock the feelings of the community by too sudden a change; but, on the other hand, it is contended that the gradual process has already been exhausted, and the period has now arrived when the final blow may be safely given to an objectionable, although ancient system connected with our judicial arrangements.

It would moreover be unwise and mischievous, in matters the subject of judicial investigation, to retain in some cases the distinction between the effect of an appeal to the Deity, and a simple affirmation as the test of credibility, and to abolish it in others; as such a course might induce ignorant and ill-instructed persons to imagine that such a distinction rendered an untruth in the latter case more venial than in the former, thereby obscuring their perception of the universal moral obligation that every one should speak truth to his neighbour at all times and under all circumstances. As an additional confirmation of the views herein expressed, it may be stated that the relaxation which has hitherto taken place in the practice of oath-taking has not been followed by any injurious consequences, and that in the prosecutions for perjury which have occurred from time to time, no case, it is believed, will be found to have occurred with reference to mere affirmations, but solely in transactions involving a testimony given on oath in the customary manner.

These views are the result of a lengthened experience in various public capacities, in which the administration of oaths forms a material item of duty, and the frequent adjuration which such functionaries are officially obliged to pronounce on many comparatively trivial occasions, must be felt as a painful and irksome task. The most hopeful endeavours towards rendering the moral sense of individuals more sensitive, and free to act without the support of material aids, must be based upon the education of the younger members of the community, as, although the mature and aged suffering from the defects of early training, and encrusted with the prejudices of long habit, may occasionally stumble at the threshold of truth, without the assistance of the old-fashioned ceremony of an oath, the inculcation upon youth of the importance of truthfulness for its own sake, without reference to such weak appliances, may tend to nurture a succeeding race in more refined and comprehensive notions of the proper sanctions upon which the duty of speaking truth should be established.

These and other similar movements may, it is hoped, gradually bring about a state of things more nearly approaching to the simple principles and motives which we attribute to the original state of man in Paradise.

Should this be accomplished, the time may arrive when in every part of the world the character of a Briton for veracity may be so well established, that his simple word will have more weight as a test of truth than any elaborately contrived ceremonious appeals to the Deity which the blind distrust of barbarous times has invented, and which the obstructive dislike to innovation of succeeding generations, has continued as a substitute for the enduring influences of Christian principle.

Societies and Institutions.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

This society held its first meeting of the present season on Monday, the 12th instant. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL presided. Mr. WALKER MARSHALL read a paper entitled, "Is a Judicial Tribunal, either of the last resort or otherwise, bound by the principles laid down by itself on previous occasions?"

After referring to the difference of opinion upon this question entertained by the judges, and the different considerations by which it is affected, according as it is considered, with relation to a tribunal of final or intermediate jurisdiction, Mr. Marshall thus continued:—There is a lax morality that much delights in saying that truth is just what each man supposes to be the case. And so it might be said that law is just what a constituted tribunal declares it to be: and so it continues until reversed, and then, but not till then, it ceases to be law. The latter notion I believe to be as erroneous as the former. It is an old definition, that law is the perfection of reason. In almost every question of pure law the premises are settled. If all the Courts were always to reason with perfect correctness, no decision would be reversed, no judgments overruled—all would arrive with the utmost certainty to the same conclusion. Bad law is in many instances nothing else than bad logic. But a conclusion which has been attained by a course of false reasoning, or by the omission of a necessary element to correct reasoning, is never otherwise than a false conclusion. It is not the less a false conclusion because it is the judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction. Moreover, its falsity may at any time be demonstrated. It is binding on the parties, in some cases upon all the rest of mankind; but does expediency or convenience require that it should be binding on the Court itself in all future cases? I take it to be abundantly clear that the three superior courts of common law exercise an independent judgment upon any matter brought before them; and that although the same point may have been decided in either or both of the other Courts, the duty of such Court is to consider for itself; and it is at liberty to arrive at a different conclusion, and to give judgment against the party in whose favour the other Court would, acting upon its own decision, have decided. The instances of conflict between the decisions of these tribunals are too numerous to admit of doubt being entertained of the fact:—cases of conflict which do not arise from each Court so deciding ignorant of the judgment of the other, but where the one has repudiated the doctrine which it knows to have been laid down by the other tribunal. Thus, in a recent case the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas construed the word "may" in the County Courts' Act as permissive; the Court of Exchequer, with full knowledge of this decision, held that it was not permissive, but obligatory. An Act of Parliament settled the difference. Without the exercise of much industry many examples would be found in which one Court in Westminster Hall has decided differently from another. The same observation applies to the equity judges of co-ordinate jurisdiction; each exercises an unfettered judgment, and sometimes decides the same point differently. Not a little of the value of a multiplicity of Courts consists in this independent action. The decision of each is a guide and a light to the others, but not a command.

Suppose this were otherwise. There would be no anomaly if the Courts who, in these matters make a law for themselves, were to respect and yield to the decisions of each other, in the same way and to the same extent as to the decisions of a court of error. If they were to say, So long as this principle, laid down by such a court of coordinate jurisdiction, is unreversed and not overruled by a Court of Error, we regard it as binding upon us, would it be convenient to act upon this theory? Would it be in accordance with the principles of justice? The function of a court is to apportion to each suitor that which is his due, according to the law of the land. The decisions of our Courts are not themselves law. They are valuable as expositions of the law; an exposition of the law by a Court of Error must be acted upon by the inferior tribunals upon the clearest and simplest ground, namely, that if it were not to act upon it, the suitor against whom judgment was given would certainly take the case to the Court of Error and have the judgment reversed. There is the strongest coercion upon the inferior tribunal from this cause to follow the decisions of that which reviews its judgments. But there is no such moral force in the case of a decision of a court of coordinate jurisdiction. In that case the Court is at liberty to say This decision is in our opinion mistaken; it is an erroneous exposition of the law; it is not law, according as we understand the law to be, drawing our inspirations from its own sources from general or special custom, from the imperishable logic of sound reason or the language of the legislature.

After endeavouring to shew that the law could not be altered by an erroneous judgment Mr. Marshall proceeded to discuss the question in its relation to previous decisions of the tribunal itself being binding upon it.

I confess (he said), I am unable to see any valid distinction in point of principle between a decision of the Court itself and one of co-ordinate jurisdiction. The notion that a decision once arrived at imposes a binding obligation upon the Court to decide in future in the same way, appears to me to be founded on this fallacy, namely, that in so deciding the Court laid down the law, and therefore, that to decide in accordance with law, it must adhere to that principle in all future cases. If this were true, law with us would be more protean in its form than the most scurrilous of its libellers have asserted. There would be one law in the Court of Queen's Bench, another in the Common Pleas, and a third in the Exchequer. One law in Lincoln's-inn and another in Roll's-yard. The cases are not few in which our Courts do conflict, and if every unreversed decision is part of the law of the land, then indeed is the uncertainty more than proverbially glorious. Our system would, if that were true, enjoy the pre-eminence over every other, of laying down propositions diametrically opposed and each equally authoritative.

But I can imagine it to be said it is not on the ground that the previous decision is "law," that the tribunal is bound by it, but upon this reasoning:—It is its own exposition of the law; the court was as wise then as it is now; it was equally assured then that the principle it propounded was correct, as it could now feel assured it would be if it were to lay down a different doctrine: therefore it is more expedient that it should adhere to the principle once laid down, than expose the administration of justice to scandal, by deciding one way in this case and another way in that.

"That in point of fact there may be a change of judicial opinion does not admit of question. A court may as clearly see the infirmity in the reasoning by which a false principle has been established by itself as by another court. A false principle, it may be, propounded at a time when the court consisted of an entirely different set of judges. In all cases in which it reconsiders the principle, it has at least one new light, for in examining critically the prior judgment, it has an aid in solving the question that the court did not enjoy in the first instance. But it may have more than this, the earlier decision may never have been accepted by the profession; it may, as it is expressed, have met with the disapproval of Westminster Hall; the other courts may have decided the contrary—upon what principle should the court be bound to persist in error?"

Several cases were cited in the paper as instances in which the superior courts of law had deliberately overruled their own previous decisions. The extent to which courts of final jurisdiction, and particularly a tribunal of ultimate appeal, ought to be bound by their own previous judgments was then discussed. The opinions of the present Lord Chancellor and of Lord Eldon to the effect that the House of Lords cannot decide contrary to a principle it has judicially applied in a previous case, was contrasted with the opinions expressed by Lord St. Leonards and by Lord Cottenham that it may; and the constitution in this respect of the courts of final appeal, of France and Prussia was examined. To affirm (said the learned reader) that the decisions of the House of Lords are binding for ever after, until repealed or altered by the legislature is to make this judicial tribunal act in a legislative capacity. No two functions can be more distinct than that of the legislative and the judicial, judicis est jus dicere non dare. The nature and effect of that which is propounded by the law maker differs widely from that which is propounded by the judge. The legislator lays down a rule founded upon the most general reasons, derives his knowledge from every possible source, avails himself of every example, is at liberty to ransack every store of knowledge and experience, to consult history and philosophy, consider the spirit of the age, and listen to the opinion of citizens of her own or any other state. The rule laid down by him is framed purposely to meet all cases within the object of the enactment. The judge, on the other hand, has only one particular example before him, considers that only, hears no evidence beyond that, and frames or applies a rule applicable to it alone; consequently he has not the same means of making a law, or rather he has none of the means which are absolutely required to make a law. And to assert that the decisions of the supreme tribunal are binding on itself, as it is undoubtedly on all other tribunals, is to say that its decisions are in effect laws. Instances were cited in which inconvenience had ensued from the House acting upon the rule that it had no power to review a previous decision; and the learned reader expressed an opinion that the balance of advantage lay in holding that the house was not absolutely concluded by every rule or principle it had at any time laid down.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought that the question was propounded in too limited a form. How is a court of primary jurisdiction bound by its previous decisions? Only when and because the decision becomes a precedent—when it is recognised by other tribunals, and in fact becomes incorporated with the general body of the law. Then the obligation in a court to follow the precedent is founded on public policy. One important element in coming to a conclusion on the present question was omitted in the paper, viz., the value of certainty in advising upon questions of law. One peculiarity of our law is important in this respect. A decision would be of no great importance, where it was the exposition of a written law; but our law is mostly unwritten, and is nowhere else to be found than in the decisions. The principle to be recognised in courts of final jurisdiction is different. Lord St. Leonards went so far as to say that the House of Lords is not bound by its own decisions, even where the circumstances are identical. In theory, no doubt, it is equally competent for the House of Lords as for inferior courts to differ from its own former decisions; but it is certainly more conducive to public interests to consider that the decision of the House of Lords finally settles the law.

Mr. WILLCOCK, Q.C., Mr. C. CLARK, Mr. E. WEBSTER, and Mr. DANIEL, Q.C., also spoke on the subject.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

MICHAELMAS TERM, 1860.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

Frederick James Hawkins, aged 25, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Forshaw and Goodman, of Liverpool.

Richard Finch, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Mayhew, of Wigan, and Messrs. Sharpe, Jackson, and Parker, of London.

Arthur Jackson, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edward Jackson, of London and Wisbeach.

Frederic William Tomkinson, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. Richard Henton, of Burslem.

The council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Hawkins, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn.

To Mr. Finch, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Jackson, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Tomkinson, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

Thomas Matthias Baker, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Baker, of Great Yarmouth, and Mr. Charles Francis Fisher, of Ventnor, Isle of Wight.

William Charles Dalrymple, aged 25, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Frederick Robinson, of London.

Joseph Augustus Hellard, aged twenty-two, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Hellard, of Portsmouth, and Messrs. Williamson, Hill, and Co., of London.

Gabriel Lindo, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Cooper and Hodgson, of London, and Mr. Nathaniel Lindo of London.

William Rogers, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Johnston, of London.

Henry Stedman, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Mr. Lindsey William Winterbotham, of Stroud, and Messrs. Lewis, Wood, and Street, of London.

The council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners have further announced to the following candidates that their answers to the questions were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes or certificates of merit, if they had been under the age of 26.

Basil Field, B.A., aged 26, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Field & Roscoe, of London.

Richard William Davis Clarence Halse, aged 32, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Head and Venn, of Exeter.

Robert Hart, aged 26, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Chilton and Burton, of London.

Edward Fleetwood Kempson, aged 26, who served his clerkship to Mr. Wm. Blackman Young, of Hastings; Messrs. Sharpe, Field, and Jackson, of London; and Messrs. Lawrence, Plews, and Boyer, of London.

Dalton Thomas Miller, aged 30, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Chilton and Burton, of London.

James Stockton, aged 33, who served his clerkship to Mr. Wm. Munton, of Banbury.

William Wigglesworth, aged 31, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Bagshaw and Son, of Manchester.

The number of candidates examined in this Term was 146; of these, 130 were passed, and 16 postponed.

ENDORSEMENT OF CHEQUES BY PROCURATION.—The following observations upon this subject are extracted from the city article in the Times of the 20th instant:—The question raised some time back as to the responsibility of bankers in paying checks drawn to order on the signature of a person pretending to hold a procuration, is likely to remain without a definitive settlement. The facts which induced public attention to the matter were as follows:—An action was brought against the Bank of England to recover the amount of a check drawn payable to order, and endorsed by a person purporting to sign by procuration from the payee, but which procuration was denied. The claim was based upon the view that the 19th section of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, which protects bankers from responsibility in paying checks purporting to be endorsed by the payee, did not extend to checks purporting to be endorsed by another person by procuration. The action came on for trial at the London sittings in July last, when Mr.

Baron Martin held, without argument, that the enactment referred to extended as well to cases of endorsement by procuration as to those purporting to be by the payee in person, the object of this proceeding being to obtain a decision of the full Court upon the question of law in the current term. It appears, however, that the plaintiff has decided not to carry the case further, and that the law must, therefore, remain in its present unsatisfactory state. At the same time it may be remarked that few persons can doubt that the immunity to the bankers conferred by the Act was intended to be complete. The clause which, in contradiction to the entire spirit of the statute law of the kingdom, exempts bankers from a liability to which all the rest of the community are bound to conform, furnishes the worst example of petty class legislation witnessed in recent times, but so long as it is permitted to remain it will be advisable for the public to regard it in all its stringency.

The Commissioners of the Board of Inland Revenue have decided that, according to the recent statute 23 and 24 Vic., c. 90, persons may pursue and kill hares by coursing with greyhounds, or by hunting with beagles or other hounds, in Ireland, as well as in England and Scotland, without a game certificate.

A gentleman, an old Harrovian, has just given £1,000 to the governors of the Harrow School. The interest is to form a prize or scholarship for such a scholar as shall distinguish himself by his attainments in scriptural knowledge.

UNITED KINGDOM LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 8, WATERLOO PLACE, PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

The Funds or Property of the Company as at 31st December, 1858, amounted to £652,618 : 3 : 10, invested in Government or other approved securities.

The Hon. FRANCIS SCOTT, CHAIRMAN.

CHARLES BERWICK CURTIS, Esq., DEPUTY CHAIRMAN.

INVALID LIVES.—Persons not in sound health may have their lives insured at equitable rates.

ACCOMMODATION IN PAYMENT OF PREMIUM.—Only one-half of the Annual Premium, when the Insurance is for life, is required to be paid for the first five years, simple interest being charged on the balance. Such arrangement is equivalent to an immediate advance of 50 per cent. upon the Annual Premium, without the borrower having recourse to the unpleasant necessity of procuring Sureties, or assigning and thereby parting with his Policy, during the currency of the Loan, irrespective of the great attendant expenses in such arrangement.

The above mode of Insurance has been found most advantageous when Policies have been required to cover monetary transactions, or when it comes applicable for Insurance are at present limited, as it only necessitates half the outlay formerly required by other Companies before the present system was instituted by this Office.

LOANS are granted likewise on real and personal securities.

Forms of Proposals and every information afforded on application to the Resident Director, 8, Waterloo-place, Pall Mall, London, S.W.

By order,

E. LENNOX BOYD, Resident Director.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The unexpected death of Mr. Coulson, Q.C., will enable the law authorities to reconsider the very important question of Parliamentary drawing—or, in other words, the preparation of Bills for the different Government departments—in sufficient time to devise some suitable plan before the meeting of Parliament. We want no more committees, general or select, of either House of Parliament; nor does any one (except, perhaps, some expectant commissioner) desire to see anything like a revivification of the happily defunct statute law commission. All the information that can possibly be desired on the subject generally is contained in numerous blue books, some of them of recent date. Indeed, one of them alone, namely the minutes of the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Statute Law Commission, three or four years ago, contains abundant information not only on the evils and the peculiar methods of our Parliamentary law-making, but also some admirable and practical suggestions for the introduction of an improved system. It has been proposed that Parliament should appoint an officer, or a board, whose duty it should be either to prepare or revise, and to report upon all Bills, and to watch them during their progress through the two houses. Another suggestion is that such functionaries should not be appointed or officially recognised by Parliament, but that they should be officers either of the Lord Chancellor or the Attorney General; or else that one such officer should be attached to each of the principal departments of government. Any scheme which would interfere with the free action of Parliament, would, of course, require parliamentary sanction, and will necessarily be attended with considerable difficulty. But no such obstacles would be in the way of improvements in the mere preparation of Government Bills. The duties of Mr. Coulson were extremely ill defined, and of a very multifarious character. It appears to have fallen to his lot, in theory at least, to draw all the Bills originating in the Home Department, the greater part of those belonging to the Colonial and Foreign departments, and a considerable number of the Treasury Bills. He was, moreover, liable to be called upon to draw or revise bills for other departments, especially where there was no standing legal staff, as, for instance, the Board of Control; and he had to frame the annual report on expiring laws, which is properly the business of a committee of the House of Commons. It requires little reflection to be convinced that Mr. Coulson's task was too great to be satisfactorily accomplished by any human being; and therefore nobody blamed him for what was so completely beyond his power, namely, the frequent obscurity, uncertainty, and verbosity of the language of our statutes, the general absence of logical or convenient arrangement of their subject matter, the unintentional repeal and re-enactment of former Acts, the forgetfulness of the differences of forms of procedure in England and the sister countries, and the many other miserable characteristics of our modern English legislation. Without waiting for the realisation of any such grand scheme as the appointment of a parliamentary board or great functionary, the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General no doubt have it in their power to re-organise the system of Parliamentary drawing, so as to ensure to every important department of State the careful preparation of Government Bills affecting such department, and their skilful revision in their passage through both Houses of Parliament. The £2,000 a-year paid to Mr. Coulson would not nearly be sufficient to accomplish this most desirable object; but the whole sum required would be trifling compared with the great advantages that would be gained from the carrying out of such a scheme as we have proposed.

A correspondence has taken place between Mr. Huddleston, Q.C., and Mr. Cookson, the president of the Incorporated Law Society, in reference to certain statements made by the former upon the trial at Worcester of a case for breach of promise of marriage, to the effect that Mr. Clutterbuck, the plaintiff's attorney, had got up the action for his own profit, and that he had on a previous occasion extorted the sum of £20 from another defendant at the suit of the same plaintiff, the action not having gone further, as Mr. Huddleston stated, than the delivery of the writ and declaration. It appears that no evidence whatever was attempted to be offered in support of this aspersion upon the character of Mr. Clutterbuck; and of course he had no opportunity allowed him of refuting the calumny. Mr. Clutterbuck, however, properly regarding the statements made as injurious to his personal and professional character, demanded an explanation of Mr. Huddleston, which was declined, whereupon Mr. Clutterbuck submitted the matter to the Incorporated Law Society, and placed in the hands of that body a vindication of his character. It appears from this document that Mr. Huddleston's statements were incorrect in some very material particulars. In the first place, instead of the costs in the former action amounting to twenty pounds, it appears that they amounted only to £12 12s. 2d.; secondly, that instead of nothing more having been done than the delivery of the writ and declaration, the action in fact had proceeded to issue; and that notice of trial had been given, subpoenas issued, and the jury panel obtained. Mr. Clutterbuck, moreover, states that he had actually prepared briefs, which were ready to be delivered to counsel, when the action was compromised.

These important facts having been embodied in a memorial to the Incorporated Law Society, which was forwarded to Messrs. Rickards & Walker, an eminent and highly respectable firm, who acted as the town agents of Mr. Clutterbuck, Mr. Cookson, wrote to Mr. Huddleston the following letter:—

"Incorporated Law Society, Sept. 12.

"Sir—The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have received from Mr. Thomas Clutterbuck, of Worcester, attorney-at-law, through his London agents, Messrs. Rickards & Walker, who are members of the society, a memorial addressed to the council praying that, for the vindication of his character, they will inquire into the facts connected with a statement which he alleges was made by you in a cause of Davis v. Bomford, tried at the Worcestershire assizes on the 16th and 17th July last, to the effect that Mr. Clutterbuck, in an action brought by the same plaintiff against a person named Skinner, had exacted from Skinner the sum of £20 for his costs in the action simply for writ and declaration.

"The Council infer from the statement made to them that no evidence was offered in support of the charge, and that Mr. Clutterbuck had no opportunity of disproving it at the time, and that the charge was not in issue in the cause.

"The Council desire me to inform you of the statement made by Mr. Clutterbuck, and to draw your attention to the letter of the defendant Skinner, and to request you will have the goodness to say whether the statement is in any respect inaccurate.

"The Council will especially feel obliged by your informing them whether the inference they have drawn from the statement of Mr. Clutterbuck is correct that no evidence was offered in support of the charge, and that he had no opportunity of dis-proving it at the time, and that the charge was not in issue in the cause.

"I have the honour to be, sir, your very obedient servant, (Signed) "WM. STRICKLAND COOKSON, President.
"J. W. Huddleston, Esq., Q.C., Temple."

The following is Mr. Huddleston's reply:—

"2, Paper-buildings, Temple, Nov. 7.

"Sir—I beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th of September, which should have received earlier attention from me had I not been absent from town during the long vacation.

"I entertain the greatest respect for the Council of the Incorporated Law Society; but on full consideration of your letter I must decline to answer the questions put to me by that body.

"Were I to do so I feel that I might be recognising the right of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society to inquire into the course taken by an advocate during the progress of a trial; and I cannot permit a privilege of counsel established for the benefit of the client to be impaired by any step which I might otherwise be disposed to adopt.

"I the more readily adhere to this conclusion, as it is obvious that the Council of the Incorporated Law Society can obtain from other sources the information which they seek to obtain from me.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) "J. W. HUDDLESTON.

"W. Strickland Cookson, Esq., President of the Incorporated Law Society, &c., &c."

Mr. Huddleston, in this letter, appears to assume that the not uncommon trick of counsel's abusing the attorney of the other side has by force of usage become "a privilege of counsel established for the benefit of the client." We take issue with him, however, upon this point, and deny that counsel have any more right to make injurious observations upon the attorney of the other side—unless such observations are relative to the issue, and are supported by evidence—than they would have to do so in the case of a perfect stranger to the cause. It may be equally injurious, and is no doubt generally intended to be more injurious, to the party on the other side than it is to his attorney, although the latter is ostensibly the direct object of attack; but it is intolerable that counsel should claim the privilege of irresponsibility for untrue statements publicly made to the injury of an attorney in the cause, especially where such statements are irrelevant to the issue, are wholly unsupported by anything like evidence, and are moreover introduced for the manifest purpose of prejudicing an adversary's case.

During the late session of Parliament a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the nature of the burthens affecting merchant shipping. Its report has been lately published. It treats of a variety of topics, the discussion of which in this Journal would be out of place. There is one, however, occupying a prominent position in the report which cannot fail to interest the professional reader. We allude to the legal liabilities at present imposed upon the British shipowner, partly through the operation of Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), and partly through the operation of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. There can be little doubt that the responsibility incurred under these statutes is frequently of an oppressive and even ruinous character. In its zeal for the protection of the public the Legislature appears to have dealt too hardly with the rights of the shipowner. To do justice to both is the problem to be solved, and the committee has done its best to solve it. We shall on a future occasion explain how it proposes that this should be done. In the meantime Mr. W. S. Lindsay is in the United States, endeavouring to obtain the sanction of the American Government to certain international arrangements respecting the liabilities in question; and the Chamber of Commerce of New York has passed resolutions approving of this proposal, which, if carried into effect, will prove of equal advantage to both countries.

The first resolution relates to the subject of collisions at sea. It affirms the principle that the liabilities of the ship-owners of both countries should be uniformly the same, and recommends that actions against them in the courts of either country should be governed by the laws of its own; that the actual value of a defaulting vessel should determine the liability; and that the same rule of the road should be adopted in both countries. The committee also recommends the assimilation of the laws of England and the United States in reference to crimes committed at sea, and that the consuls of both countries should have jurisdiction over all petty crimes and offences committed on board the vessels of either, whether in port or at sea.

The State of New York, by its constitution of 1846, established an elective judiciary with short terms of office; and the startling precedent was speedily followed in many other States of the Union. After a short trial of fourteen years this rash defiance of all experience, ancient and modern, has already shown itself to be mischievous in the extreme. It has been found, according to the testimony of a New York contemporary, that all the better class of lawyers, the men who by years and service merit the honours of the profession, shrink from the nomination to the bench as if it involved contamination. The class of men who from time to time as vacancies occur offer themselves as candidates for the judicial office are becoming worse and worse. At a recent election for judges at Brooklyn, the great majority of the delegates named by one of the political parties for the purpose of ensuring the election of their own partisans was composed of convicted thieves and fellows of the pugilistic trade. The District Attorney of King's County, U. S., in a speech to a political meeting of the opposite party, thus describes these delegates:—

"I hold in my hand a list of the delegates who purport to have been elected to the convention. In the first ward, two delegates are named who have recently been indicted and convicted of crime since the 1st of January, who are well known to the police; and who nevertheless seem to have become essential to the representation of the first ward in democratic conventions. Then, glancing at the list of the sixth ward, there is a delegate who has been arrested over and over again for crime in this city, indicted and punished, well known as a disreputable character—an outlaw dangerous to society in every way—and yet he has become so important in our local government that he is sent to a convention to select our judges, sheriffs, and other officers."

And so he goes on at considerable length to describe numerous other delegates who are men of similarly bad repute, and he adds:—

"Here is a convention come together to nominate a city judge, to whose hands are to be entrusted the highest and most sacred responsibilities. A man could not have got a nomination unless he stood well with these dangerous classes, and that is a bad premonitory symptom, as the doctors would say. To obtain their good-will he must have catered to their tastes, and taken pains to stand well with them, in order to get their support as against respectable men. He is thus demoralized from the start, and entirely unfitted for the faithful discharge of the judicial duties. I do not believe in the election of judges; it is one of the greatest wrongs ever inflicted on a free society, at the best. But what does it become when judges are nominated by these men whom I have described from the criminal records? What is his position if elected? Why, he is in the hands of the Philistines. Mark the career of such a judge. You will find him yielding and conceding to the criminal element in our community, instead of administering justice."

It must be borne in mind that this is a picture drawn by an enemy; but it is nevertheless too well corroborated by unimpeachable testimony from all quarters to be seriously doubted as to its general truth. Even the Americans themselves are beginning to be startled at the lamentable social results which have already arose from their system of elective judgeships. A very trenchant letter upon the subject, from Judge Edmonds, of New York, has just been published, and caused some sensation in that State. It appears that the office of Recorder of the city of New York is the most important and remunerative in the State; and the judge, who is a lawyer of unquestionable merit, had been asked to put up as a candidate for the office, which is now vacant. In reply, after other reasons, he says, "My tenure of office would be only three years: while on the bench I should of course be withdrawn from political action, and could not resort to the usual means to secure my continuance in it; while on the other hand, ambitious aspirants for the position would be restrained by no such consideration, and would easily oust me long before I could give any permanency to the character I should aim to give my Court." To this cause Mr. Edmonds attributes the fact that only four out of fourteen justices of the superior courts have been re-elected; while there is not a single instance of the re-election of a justice of the supreme court or a recorder. Besides, he adds, "the shortness of the term would continually subject me to the imputation of shaping my decisions in reference to a re-election. I experienced this at the close of my judicial career, and I had abundant cause to know that I was thereby shorn of my independence, and my usefulness was impaired. I felt this so keenly that I then resolved never to undergo it again." We could add other testimonies on this subject to the same effect as that of Mr. Edmonds and the District Attorney of King's County, but we have already dwelt rather long upon this topic. We shall only add, that the case bearing on the rights of proprietors of horse railways, which will be found elsewhere in these columns, was decided by a tribunal which has not yet been subjected to the deleterious influence of popular election, the State of Massachusetts being one of the few States in the Union which have resisted the bad precedent set by the State of New York. As a matter of fact, perhaps we might say as a consequence, the decisions of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts are better worth the attention of English lawyers than those of most other tribunals of the United States.

The Liverpool Law Society has published its report for the past year. One of the most important subjects that has occupied its attention recently has been the appointment of a second stipendiary magistrate which the committee has left no means untried to effect, without success however for the present. The Society recommends the establishment of a professional Exchange to facilitate the communication of members; and a Law Clearing House for the settlement of members' accounts. The report contains a review of the various important measures of last session, with remarks thereon by the committee; and the following observations relate to some important points of practice:—

"Your committee carefully considered the question of the extent of the right of the solicitor for the mortgagee to refuse to produce the deeds in his possession, except to abstracts furnished by himself, and they considered it to be the practice that the mortgagee's solicitor was entitled to furnish an abstract of all deeds in his possession, but not an abstract of deeds not in his possession and covenanted to be produced, and they accordingly considered that he would be justified in refusing to produce the deeds for examination, with an abstract furnished by any other party; but exceptional cases of this kind may probably arise."

The committee also discusses the question which was raised two or three years ago in the well-known case of Viney v. Chaplin, (6 W. R. 562), as to whether a vendor's or mortgagee's solicitor is entitled to receive the purchase or mortgage money, by virtue of his office, and of his having in his possession the deed of conveyance or mortgage with endorsed receipt:—

"The subject of giving an authority to solicitors to receive purchase and other moneys in the settlement of transactions when their clients were not personally present, but had signed receipts on the deeds, has been discussed at great length, and your committee have communicated with the Incorporated Law Society, and the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, on the subject. The London practice is, almost invariably, to require it, and the council of the former body are desirous to adhere to that practice; but the committee of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association consider that it would be productive of an inconvenience to lay down an absolute rule to require such an authority in all cases. Your committee think that the law should be changed in that respect, and that the delivery of the receipted document by the solicitor (the recognised agent of his client) should discharge the person paying the money from any responsibility; however, as this question of law is again raised, and is now waiting the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, your Committee have thought it desirable to take no further steps until that judgment be known, particularly as they understand that the parties intend to take the decision of the Court of Error."

It is expected that the new orders in Chancery relating to evidence will be issued before Hilary Term. We believe they have been already drawn, and that they are now under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, and the other equity judges. The expectation is general that with the next term we shall see the introduction into chancery proceedings of voir dire evidence in open Court.

The Middlesex magistrates propose, under the provisions of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, to offer the coroners for the county salaries in lieu of fees, mileage and allowances calculated upon an average of the last five years. Three of the coroners attended the meeting of the magistrates at which this proposition was made, and objected to it, Mr. Wakley threatening an "appeal to a higher authority," whatever that may mean.

The Inns of Court Rifle Volunteers will be inspected by Colonel Mc Murdo, in Richmond Park, to day at 3 o'clock. Should, however, the weather prove unfavourable, the inspection will take place in Gray's-inn-square, at the same hour. We believe that it is proposed that the Corps should entertain Colonel Mc Murdo, this evening, at the Albion, Aldersgate street.

THE CASE OF SHEDDEN v. PATRICK.

A case which has occupied for fourteen days the attention of a court, where a heavy mass of business is depending, may naturally be supposed by hasty readers of the daily newspapers to be of a difficulty proportioned to its length. But really the case of Shedden v. Patrick involved no very perplexing question either of fact or law; and it is principally remarkable for the ability displayed by the female petitioner who conducted her own and her father's case, and for the unusual indulgence which allowed this lady to be occasionally assisted by counsel while still supporting the main burden of long and intricate statements and examinations of witnesses by her own retentive memory and ready tongue. Miss Shedden is certainly the most eminent of the ladies who of late years have rather frequently undertaken to be their own advocates. It is to be feared that this practice is a growing one, and that the course of business in our courts will be obstructed, and the temper of the judges tried, by an increasing number of vehement, and perhaps eloquent, but discursive and almost endless speeches on the model of those to which Sir C. Cresswell and his two associates have listened during so many tedious hours of the last term. Notwithstanding the desponding anticipations of the presiding judge, the statements and evidence in the case did actually reach their end on Tuesday last, the fourteenth day. There was a great deal of relevant matter to consider, but it had been mixed throughout the hearing with a great deal more that was irrelevant, and so the Court had had time enough to make up its mind during the hearing, and accordingly judgment was forthwith delivered to the effect that the petitioners had wholly failed in making out their case.

The suit was instituted under the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1858, to obtain a declaration that the father and mother of the elder petitioner, Mr. Shedden, were lawfully married prior to his birth, and that he was their legitimate son and heir, and a natural born subject of the British Crown. The younger petitioner, Miss Shedden, was Mr. Shedden's daughter, and as it was stated that she has a brother living, it appears that her surprising efforts in the conduct of the case have been sustained by feeling rather than by interest. She seems to have devoted herself, with the ardent enthusiasm and imperfect logic of her sex, to the task of rescuing the memory of her grandmother from what she will no doubt believe to her last hour to be a calumnious and wicked imputation. Evidently she has taken up a conviction of the purity of her family history which will not be shaken by the most patient hearing and the most exhaustive arguments of adverse judges. So long as Miss Shedden lives she will assert that injustice has been done her in the Divorce Court; but we think that impartial spectators of the proceedings will be of opinion that, neither personally nor by counsel, was there any hope of her satisfying the Court of the truth of the allegations of the petition. The case which she propounded was, that William Shedden, her grandfather, the owner of certain estates in Ayrshire, went about the year 1770 to North America, where he married his first wife, who soon died. The petitioners alleged that in 1790 William Shedden married at New York his second wife Ann Wilson, and lived with her as her husband till his death in 1798. He had two children by Ann Wilson, a daughter still living, and the elder petitioner. It was common ground that William Shedden was married to Ann Wilson on his death bed. The respondents alleged that this was done in order to legitimize, as far as possible, the issue of an illicit intercourse. The petitioners undertook to prove that this ceremony was performed for the purpose of giving notoriety to a previous private marriage; that William Shedden and Ann Wilson had never lived together otherwise than as man and wife, known and visited as such by the best society in New York; and that his children were for all purposes legitimate, and inasmuch as he had adhered to the royalist side in the American war, and had retained his character of a British subject, they also were entitled to all the rights of natural born British subjects. The principal opponent of this claim was a nephew of William Shedden, named William Patrick, one of the children of the marriage of William Shedden's sister with John Patrick, who now holds certain estates in Ayrshire, by the title of heir to William Shedden, and which title of course depended upon the illegitimacy of the children of Ann Wilson. The main question in the cause, therefore, was whether these children were born in lawful wedlock, and it does not seem to us that this question was so much involved in doubt as might have been expected at so great a distance both of time and space. The principal respondent, although ninety years of age, is still in possession of his faculties, and there are several important witnesses yet living at an advanced age.

The respondents relied not only upon the evidence which they produced to prove that Ann Wilson was the mistress, and not the wife, of William Shedden, but also upon three previous judgments of competent tribunals, which, as they alleged, had conclusively decided in their favour. There had been in 1801 a proceeding in the Scottish Court of Session by the guardian of the elder petitioner, then an infant, in which it was determined that he was not a legitimate son of William Shedden; and this decision was affirmed on appeal by the House of Lords. There had been in 1848 a further proceeding by the elder petitioner in the Court of Session, in which it was declared that the decree in the former suit had not been obtained by fraud, and which upon the merits re-affirmed the sentence of illegitimacy; and this decision also was sustained on an appeal to the House of Lords in 1854. And lastly, there had been a proceeding in the Court of Session as a consistorial court, which was dismissed. Upon the legal effect of these three judgments as a bar to the claim of the petitioners, Miss Shedden would have been allowed the assistance of counsel if it had been necessary. The Court, however, decided in favour of the petitioners, without hearing any argument on their side, on the ground that by the statute the Attorney-General was a necessary party to the present proceeding, and as he was not a party to the former suits, the respondents' plea of res judicata could not prevail. It had been further contended that the present proceeding was barred by the 10th section of the statute, under which it had been instituted. That section, however, only provides that no proceeding "to be had" under the Act shall affect any final judgment already pronounced, and does not say that no proceeding shall be had which may affect any such final judgment. Under the statute, therefore, the petition might be presented, and if the evidence in support of it were sufficient, a declaration might be obtained as prayed; but whether such a declaration could alter the right to property was at least doubtful. If the petitioners succeeded in making out their case, the respondents might then fall back upon the judgments of the House of Lords; but they could not set them up as a preliminary bar to the investigation. The Court, therefore, proceeded to hear all the evidence, material and immaterial, that was offered to it on several weary days; and although we may lament this great consumption of public time, it was nevertheless desirable that the case should be fully heard, and decided, as it has been, upon its substantial merits.

One of the principal features in the evidence was a letter alleged to have been written by William Shedden to the respondent William Patrick, in 1798, a few days before his death. That letter contained this passage:—"I am now going to quit this world. I have married Miss Ann Wilson, which is approved by my friends here, and which restores her and two fine children I have by her to honour and credit." If that letter was genuine there was an end of the whole case; and there really does not seem to be any ground to doubt its genuineness. It is seldom that a case which necessarily or unnecessarily has been protracted over many days can be brought to such a simple point; and when the controversy is thus reduced to its true dimensions we are filled with amazement and consternation at the enormous amount of time occupied by it. The combination of party and advocate in the conduct of the petitioners' case was of course an exceptional indulgence. It appears to be an excellent contrivance for wasting valuable time. If fatigue stops the party the counsel takes up the talk; and if the counsel is restrained by the habit of only speaking when he has something material to say, the party has no such scruples. In the present instance, both the course of the proceedings and the resolution and energy of the female petitioner have been such as are not likely to become common in our courts. But even after making every requisite allowance for these peculiarities, it is an alarming symptom of the rise of the tide of talk that fourteen days should have been occupied by a case that does not admit of any reasonable doubt.

STATISTICS OF THE COUNTY COURTS FOR 1859.

Our present County Courts were established by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, but the jurisdiction conferred by that statute has since been frequently extended, as to the amount for which suits may be instituted, also to matters of insolvency, the arrest of absconding debtors, contested cases of probate of wills, charitable trusts, and to the protection of the property of married women deserted by their husbands. Prior to 1846, the jurisdiction of the then county courts extended only to 40s. But that amount was much more valuable when these courts were founded by Alfred the Great than the same denomination of coin is at present; so that the Act of 1846 may be considered as having restored, rather than created, the monetary jurisdiction of these courts. The denomination or value of 40s. runs through all our early legal records, as indicating almost a distinction of caste. The judges of these courts were the freeholders, presided over by the Earl. There existed prior to 1846, many other courts by prescription, and also manorial courts, having a jurisdiction as to claims of a small amount; upwards of 100 courts of request and courts of conscience were likewise established from time to time by statute, 46 of these being under separate local Acts. The Act of 1846 did not abolish these courts; but, as it defined the jurisdiction and procedure, and settled a moderate scale of the fees and costs of the county courts, it has, with the exception of the few instances hereafter noticed, virtually superseded the other courts. The Friendly Societies Act of 1855, the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855, and the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, have been extended to the county courts. The expense of maintaining the county courts, which amounts to almost the yearly sum of £250,000, is defrayed, with the exception of the salaries of the ministerial officers, by an annual vote. The Court is now by statute a court of record, and has an equitable, as well as a legal jurisdiction. It has a quasi exclusive jurisdiction as to claims under £20, with a few exceptions, and also as to cases under the "Protection Acts," and in some matters relating to Friendly Societies, in all which cases the judge's decision is final. It has a concurrent jurisdiction for claims not exceeding £50, but the judge's decision is open to appeal. It also has jurisdiction in cases of replevin, and ejectment between landlord and tenant. By sect. 23 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, the parties—except in cases of criminal conversation—may by consent confer a jurisdiction upon the county courts. They have also a jurisdiction as to cases of partnerships, distributive shares on intestacy, and legacies up to £50. But when the claim exceeds £5, either party may require a jury to determine the action.

The plaints entered in the county courts in 1859 (including 61 cases sent from the superior courts) amounted to no less a number than 714,623. Of these 373,657 were adjudicated upon, of which only 988 were determined by a jury. No very conclusive inference can be drawn from the paucity of cases in which the parties exercised their right of having the aid of a jury, as to the less urgent necessity supposed to exist for such a tribunal in civil matters; because, as the claimant for a jury should pay the expense of this aid in the first instance, the smallness of the amount disputed, or the poverty of the opposite party, might be a sufficient motive to deter a party from such a course, even though he should prefer it. Moreover, as the parties themselves often conduct their cases in the county courts without professional aid, they may not be mindful of their right to claim a jury.

The procedure of these courts being practically of an almost exclusively executive character, used to enforce claims "rather than to determine disputed liabilities," we cannot, notwithstanding the confessedly general impression as to the uselessness of a jury as a method of trial in all civil cases, infer that the statistics of the county courts furnish any evidence of the actual influence of such an opinion on the conduct of persons who really had some important question of fact to be adjudicated upon. One peculiar circumstance also tends to vest the entire jurisdiction in the judge. He possesses a power not vested in the judges of the superior courts, of ordering that a judgment, when recovered by the plaintiff, if under £20, shall be paid by instalments. The Act appears to be silent as to the power of the judge to direct interest to accrue until the last instalment be paid. Yet this is an important element for the satisfactory exercise of such a discretion in the judge. The total number of judgments was for the past year 442,500; for the plaintiff, 285,984; for the plaintiff by consent, 137,978; for plaintiff by default, 588; of non-suit, 8,861; for defendants, 9,089. Of judgment summonses to enforce payment by commitment, 118,872 were issued, of which only 55,082 were heard, the issuing of the rest having probably produced the desired effect. The number of warrants of commitment issued was 27,284; of debtors imprisoned, 9,003; of executions issued against goods, 98,589, and of sales, 3,776. The total amount for which plaints were entered was £1,754,971; the amount for which judgments were obtained by plaintiffs on original hearings was, for debt, £851,732; for costs, £37,628. The total amount of fees on all proceedings was £215,623. The want of a bonâ fide defence in most of the cases that fall within the cognizance of these courts is shown by the facts noticed as evidence for this in the report, that more than one-half (52·2 per cent.) of the cases entered were settled without being brought before the Court, and that 64·6 per cent. of the judgments were for the plaintiff, and 31·2 per cent. were by consent for him also, the terms of payment, when settled, being capable of being enforced by the Court, so that in 96 cases nearly in the 100 the issue was for the plaintiff. Of the remaining cases, 2 per cent. ended in a non-suit, so that in 2 per cent. only was the issue for the defendant. Recourse was seldom had to extreme remedies on these judgments.

The commitments for debt did not exceed 2·2 per cent. The sales on executions did not exceed 0·8 per cent. The total amount sought to be recovered was £1,754,971, being an average of £2 9s. 1d. for each case. Judgments were obtained for rather less than half of the former sum. The nature of the litigations in these courts, as is observed by the report, is shown by the judgments, 250,189 of which were in cases of 40s. and under; 72,829 for sums from 40s. to £5; 26,790 for sums from £5 to £10; 11,225 for sums from £10 to £20; 3,631 for sums from £20 to £50; and 16, by consent, for sums above £50. It would be an important improvement in the statistics of these courts if the returns distinguished the legal from the equitable cases. We could thus infer how far the legal machinery of the superior courts of common law was adequate to the requirements of the community; for, although the amount for which claims are sought to be enforced in the two classes of superior and county courts is necessarily different, the average character of the causes of action may be fairly presumed to be the same.

Under the Charitable Trusts Act 140 cases were heard, in 137 of which relief was granted. Protection orders to married women deserted by their husbands were registered in 719 cases; in 6 such cases the orders were, on hearing, discharged. The cases of insolvency were 1,944 ; of protection, 1,782. There were only two cases under the Probate Act.

Of the Borough Hundred Manorial Courts, and the courts held under local acts, only 33 are in active operation or demand, and in but 9 of these did the total of the amounts claimed exceed £1,000. But in 3 of these courts suits were instituted for the following large amounts, viz., in the Court of the Sheriff of London 9,677 plaints were entered for a total of £31,979 ; in the Manchester Court of Record, 3,225 writs were issued for a total of £42,253, and in the Court for the Hundred of Salford, 1,658 writs were issued, for a total of £21,368. In the Lord Mayor's Court, London, which has a varied and peculiar jurisdiction in matters connected with the City customs, foreign attachments, sequestrations, apprenticeships, &c., as well as in suits for debt, and in matters of equity, the total number of proceedings was 3,754 ; the total amount of claims, £392,978 ; and the total amount of fees, exclusive of costs, £1,869. In the Stannaries Court of Devonshire and Cornwall, which has an exclusive jurisdiction as to suits affecting the miners there, except as to land or life, decrees on the equity side were, in the past year, obtained for a total of £6,345, with £534 costs, and £208 court fees ; and on the civil side plaints were entered for a total of £1,150, and judgments obtained for a total of £442.

The county courts adjudicated upon more than half of the total of petitions filed under the Insolvency Acts during the past year, and upon nearly one-half of the petitions filed under the Protection Acts.

As statistics, however, are valuable only when complete, we shall defer stating the statistics of the county courts as to insolvency until we come to consider the statistics in insolvency generally, when a consideration of the several items, one with another, may best help us to form our estimate of the working of this species of jurisdiction, as also of the policy of the law generally which allows imprisonment to be inflicted upon debtors. It may, however, be here stated that in cases of absconding debtors, 69 warrants to arrest were granted ; the debt and costs were paid in 73 cases, (there is probably a mistake in these figures) ; and in 16 cases the warrant was suspended.

The statistics of so many warrants of commitment, and of such a number of actual imprisonments, under the ordinary jurisdiction of the county courts, suggest serious considerations as to the policy of the law in allowing commitments for debts of small amount. In Ireland the minimum amount for which a debtor may be committed is, we think, judiciously settled at £10. A similar rule in England (if, indeed, imprisonment for debt should not be wholly abolished), would not affect any proper credits, and would prevent the loss entailed upon the unhappy debtors by the present system, as also the expense of prisons pro tanto upon the public. The small ratio of the commitments to the warrants for commitment does not prove a healthful action of the system ; as the debtors, who thus at last paid their debts may have been either very litigious, and should not have been trusted, or, if unable to pay previously, had, perhaps, finally to borrow at a still higher rate of usury or overcharge, in order to resist this undue pressure of the law. Both these classes, the litigious and the oppressed, probably return, in some fixed cycle, to swell the statistics for each year ; as the same criminals, unreformed by punishment, return to the cells from which they often before issued.

Imprisonment for small debts is aggravated still more in its severity by the fact that it does not operate as a satisfaction of the debt, which may be sought to be enforced by subsequent executions against the goods of the debtor, or by his re-commitment, if, having acquired the means of payment, he will not discharge his liability, upon all of which facts the decision of the judge is conclusive.

The number of appeals was only 20, of the result of which the statistics do not inform us ; of orders to stay proceedings, 64 ; and of writs of certiorari to remove proceedings, 135. The statistics of these courts do not give the number of days on which the judges sat in each court, nor a general average of their sittings ; yet, this is a most important element in all considerations relating to the future improvement of these courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER.

Nov. 26.—Ex parte Howard.—In this case an application was made for a rule calling upon Thomas Hinton, the publisher of the Portsmouth Guardian, to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him for a series of libels published in that journal, imputing to the applicant, Mr. Howard, the town clerk of Portsmouth, corruption in his office. A series of articles had been published in that newspaper commencing in August last, and continued to the 22d inst., imputing to the applicant that he had taken advantage of his position as town clerk to get the money of the ratepayers expended in publishing advertisements and lists in a journal in which Mr. Howard had some interest to the exclusion of other journals published in the same town, and read by a larger number of the working classes, whose money was so spent.

Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN intimated that he did not think that the case was one for the interposition of the Court. The town clerk might very properly apply to the town council to liberate him from any imputation, but the Court could not interfere.

Rule refused.

(Sittings in Banco, Michaelmas Term, before Lord Chief Justice ERLE and Justices BYLES and KEATING.)

Nov. 26.—Shadwell v. Shadwell.—The Court to-day gave judgment in this case which was an action brought by the plaintiff, a Chancery barrister, against the representatives of his uncle deceased, on a written promise made by his uncle to allow him on his marriage £150 a-year until such time as he should make £600 a-year by his profession. The annuity was paid for thirteen years, and five years arrears were due. The plaintiff averred that he never had made this amount by his profession. The defendant demurred to the promise set out in the declaration on the ground that it was without consideration, and also pleaded that the plaintiff was to continue in his profession as the ground of the promise, and averred that he had left it, except to practise as a revising barrister.

The Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, but Mr. Justice Byles differed in thinking that there was no consideration for the promise to support the action.

Nov. 26.—Bulmer v. Morris.—This was a consolidated appeal from a decision of the revising barrister for the West Riding of Yorkshire, who had decided against the claim of a member of a joint-stock company to be placed on the register of voters for the county in respect of his interest in the corporate property of the company of which he was a member. The Court affirmed the decision of the revising barrister.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings in Banco, before the Lord Chief Baron, Mr. Baron BRAMWELL, Mr. Baron CHANNELL and Mr. Baron WILDE.)

Nov. 26.—Fidley v. Oxlade.—This was an action, by an attorney, to recover costs, arising out of an action which he brought for the defendant against another person, under the Bills of Exchange Act. The twelfth day allowed by the statute to sign judgment fell upon a Sunday, when the plaintiff signed on the following day.

The judgment was set aside by a judge at chambers, on the ground that Sunday ought not to have counted as one of the twelve days.

The defendant in the present action pleaded the signing by the plaintiff as negligence, when the under-sheriff before whom the case was tried told the jury that he was bound by a decision of the Lord Chief Justice to the effect that Monday was too soon, and therefore, the judgment was wrongly signed, whereupon the jury found for a much smaller amount than the plaintiff claimed.

A rule was moved for and obtained on the 3rd inst (ante p 4) on the ground that the judgment was rightly signed, and, if not, then there was neither negligence in law nor fact. It was stated to be a matter of importance to the plaintiff, who carried on an extensive agency business, to know whether the twelve days were inclusive or exclusive of Sunday.

The defendant in person now showed cause against the rule.

The LORD CHIEF BARON intimated that, inasmuch as there existed a difference of opinion on the bench as to whether the judgment was rightly or wrongly signed, under the circumstances detailed, and, as the question was one of considerable importance to the profession as well as the public generally, it was advisable that some settled rule should be arrived at on the matter. The rule, therefore, with the consent of both sides, was enlarged till next term.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Nov. 25.—The sittings of the above court were resumed on this day. The court was opened at 10 o'clock by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, who presided for the first time in that capacity. Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., the Recorder, Mr. Robert Malcolm Kerr, judge of the Sheriffs' Court, Aldermen Challis, Finnis, Sir R. W. Carden, Rose, Phillips, and Conder, Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton, and Mr. Under-Sheriff Gammon. The calendar was much lighter than usual.

Mr. James Mason, of No. 42, Chalcot-villas, Haverstock-hill, has been appointed a London commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery.

EQUITY.

TRUSTEE—SOLICITOR.

Pollard v. Doyle, V. C. K., 9 W. R. 28.

This case affords one of the harshest illustrations of the rule which deprives solicitor-trustees of their costs. A solicitor was the executor of a plaintiff in a suit to satisfy a judgment debt, to which the judgment creditors were parties. The plaintiff having died, the executor (the solicitor) revived the suit in his own name, and conducted it in a most beneficial manner, as it appeared, for the parties interested. The assignee of the judgment creditor, who resisted the payment of profit costs to the solicitor, it was admitted obtained the assignment subsequent to, and with notice of, a decree directing the taxation and payment of costs. The Vice-Chancellor held, however, that as between the plaintiff and the judgment creditors—although there appeared to have been no reason originally for making them parties—nevertheless, that between them a fiduciary relation existed, and, therefore, that the solicitor should be allowed no profit costs. This case is mainly useful as settling the point that there is no distinction between the case of a solicitor who is an express trustee, and one who is a trustee merely by construction of law; nor between the case of a solicitor-trustee and his cestui que trusts, and that of an executor and the parties beneficially interested in the estate of the testator. The latter point, however, appears to have been assumed as unquestionable by Lord Lyndhurst, in what may be considered the leading case on the general rule—namely, New v. Jones, 1 M. N. & G. 668 (n).

RAILWAY COMPANY—PARTIES.

Hare v. The London and North-western Railway Company, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 33.

An interesting question, as to the necessary parties to a suit instituted against a railway company and its directors, arose in this case. The bill was filed by a stockholder, for the purpose of setting aside as illegal and void an agreement entered into (in 1856) between the directors of the defendant's company, and six other companies, for the purpose of regulating the Scotch through traffic. An objection was taken upon the case being opened, that the suit could not proceed in the absence of the six other companies, who had been acting upon the agreement during the four years since its execution. The leading case upon the subject of parties, where any transaction of a public body, or of any of its members, is impeached in the Court of Chancery is the case of the Attorney-General v. Wilson, 1 Cr. & Ph. 1, in which Lord Cottenham laid it down, that where a liability arises from the wrongful act of several parties, each is liable distinctly from the others. In that case an information and bill was filed by the Corporation of York for the purpose of making five of its members personally liable to make good certain funds which it was alleged had been wrongfully dealt with by the defendants: for whom it was argued that the acts complained of were done by direction of the corporation; that persons acting in a corporate character are not personally liable; and that it would be unjust to fasten a liability upon five individuals out of a large number who had joined or acquiesced in the impeached transaction. Lord Cottenham held, however, that the suit was properly framed, and decreed the relief to the plaintiffs which they sought against the five individual defendants, in the absence of the other persons, who, it appeared, had joined or acquiesced in the transaction complained of. His Lordship, referring to the older case of the Charitable Corporation v. Sutton, 2 Atk., 400, said, "It was urged that as the injury had arisen from the misconduct of many, each ought to be answerable for so much only as his particular misconduct had occasioned;" but Lord Hardwicke said, "If this doctrine should prevail it is indeed laying the axe to the root of the tree. But if upon inquiry there should appear to be a supine negligence in all of them by which a gross complicated loss happens, I will never determine that they are not all guilty; nor will I ever determine that a court of equity cannot lay hold of every breach of trust; let the person guilty of it be either in a private or a public capacity." "In cases of this kind," Lord Cottenham continues, "where the liability arises from the wrongful act of the parties, each is liable for all the consequences, and there is no contribution between them, and each case is distinct, depending upon the evidence against each party." In the present case, applying the principle laid down by Lord Cottenham, a suit might probably have been maintained against the directors individually, or such of them as were parties to the impeached agreement, if it could be shown that they had been guilty of a wrongful act which caused damage to the plaintiff; but the agreement having been acted upon by the six other companies for a period of four years, and the plaintiff seeking to set it aside altogether, and not merely to get compensation for the wrong which had been done, it was necessary to make the six other companies parties to the suit, inasmuch as they had a clear interest in the subject matter of litigation. The Vice-Chancellor, therefore, allowed the objection; and the case is useful as showing one important limitation to the rule laid down by Lord Cottenham in the Attorney-General v. Wilson.

COMMON LAW.

PROPRIETARY CHAPELS—RIGHT OF ENTRY. LAW AS TO.

Bosanquet v. Heath, Q. B., 9 W. R. 35.

Every parishioner has an undoubted right to resort to his parish church for the purpose of attending divine worship there; and cannot be compelled to leave it so long as he conducts himself there with propriety. And if the churchwardens or others (in or out of authority) cause him on any pretext—short of his improper behaviour therein—to be removed against his will from the edifice, he is entitled to sue them at law, and recover damages for the assault. It is, however, important to remember that this right extends only to the parish church; and not to any other place of worship within its boundaries which has been dedicated and devoted by the proprietor thereof to the service of God, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England; or which is used for such worship by a dissenting congregation. Such buildings (though in the case of a Church of England chapel they must be duly licensed by the bishop) retain their character of being private property; and the owners thereof may justify the removal of any person who, against their permission, persists in entering, though for the purpose of joining in divine worship. And in the present case, accordingly, the defendant in an action brought against him for removing the plaintiff from a proprietary chapel, successfully justified as the owner. It is apprehended that the law on this point with regard to district churches, which under the New Parishes Acts are the legalized places of Church of England worship for the inhabitants of a district, constituted for ecclesiastical purposes a new parish, is somewhat different; and that to such a church a resident within the district has a right to resort, concurrently with his common law right also to resort to the church of that parish to which he is assessed to the poor rate. But this is a point upon which it is not intended to express here any decided opinion. (See Ball v. Cross, 1 Salk. 165. Dent v. Robs. (You. & L. 1.)

ARBITRATION, LAW OF—AMENDMENT—ORDER OF REFERENCE "ON THE USUAL TERMS."

Thompson v. Bowyer, C. P., 9 W. R. 35.

Where an order of reference is made at the trial by consent "on the usual terms," one of such terms is as follows, "That the arbitrator shall have all the powers as to certifying and amending pleadings and proceedings and otherwise of a judge at nisi prius." Such a clause appears to form one of the usual terms from the book of practice (see Chitty's Forms of Practical Proceedings, 7th ed. p. 869); and that it is, in practice, usually inserted in such orders when fully drawn up, is common learning. In the present case an order agreed to be on the "usual terms," seems to have been inadvertently drawn up without the insertion of an amending clause which was afterwards, at the instance of the referee, inserted under a supplementary order. One of the parties to the reference opposed such order being allowed to stand, contending that its insertion varied the terms of the reference; and if it had so operated, the Court would have set it aside, for an order of reference cannot be varied (see Morgan v. Tarte, 11 Exch. 82). But the Court held that the original order being directed to be "on the usual terms," a power of amending co-extensive with that of a judge at nisi prius, became thereby vested in the referee without any express clause to that effect.

CRIMINAL LAW.

ABDUCTION OF GIRLS FROM THE POSSESSION OF THEIR PARENTS—9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 20.

Reg. v. Timmins, C.C.R., 9 W. R., 36.

The abduction of a child (whether male or female) under the age of ten years from its parents or guardian, either with the intent to deprive them of its possession or to steal any article on its person, is dealt with by 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 21, and is thereby made a felony; and it is punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment. And by the preceding section of the same statute, the taking of an unmarried girl, under the age of sixteen years, "out of the possession" of her parents or guardian is made a misdemeanour punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, though no intent can be shown, so that the taking be "unlawful."

The present case was an indictment under the last section, and it appeared that the prisoner had taken the girl in question (aged 14 years and 4 months) from her home, where she was living with her parents, for the purpose of having connection with her (with her own consent and without the knowledge of her father), intending at the time that the taking should be temporary merely. The time of her absence was three days. The question reserved for the judges was whether a temporary taking away, was sufficient to constitute an offence under the statute.

The Court held that under the particular circumstances of the case, the offence had been committed; the taking of the girl away for so long a period as three days, being inconsistent with her father's possession of her. But the Court confined themselves to the particular case before them, and declined to express any opinion as to what would be the effect of merely causing the girl to pass her father's threshold for an immoral purpose. It may be remarked that it has been, in several cases, held that the girl's consent in these cases is not material.—(See further as to the proper construction of this section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31; Reg. v. Meadows, 1 Car. & Kir., 399; Reg. v. Robins ib. 456, and Manktelow's Case, 1 Dears. C. C. R. 159.)

EMBEZZLEMENT, WHAT CONSTITUTES AN.

Reg. v. Guelder, C. C. R., 9 W. R., 38.

The question for the Court here was whether the following facts constituted the crime of embezzlement.

It was the duty of the prisoner, as the servant of certain overseers, to collect rates; and on receiving them, to pay them into a bank to the account of the overseers, obtaining in return from them a receipt in respect of the sums so paid in. It was also his duty to enter in a book kept by himself the various sums he received, thus charging himself at the half-yearly audit by his own book, and discharging himself by the overseer's receipts. The prisoner appropriated to his own use certain monies he so received; and then obtained from the overseers their receipts in respect of the same sums, by falsely asserting he had paid them into their account; and by this means he successfully passed through the next audit, though prior to such audit he properly entered into the book which he kept himself, the various sums he had in fact received and appropriated. The Court, without calling on the counsel for the Crown, held that on these facts the prisoner had been rightly convicted of embezzlement; inasmuch as he could not purge himself from the offence of appropriating to his own purposes monies he had received, by afterwards charging himself with their receipt in his book.

There does not, in truth, seem the least ground to doubt of the propriety of the conviction in this case, though the propriety of reserving such a point for the consideration of the Court seems more questionable. Surely a clearer case has seldom been tried; or one in which the facts proved amounted more conclusively to that offence of embezzlement as defined in the books—namely, "a crime which is distinguished from larceny as being committed in respect of property which is not at the time in the actual or legal possession of the owner." (See Reg. v. Gill, 1 Dears. C. C. R. 289.)

EXONERATION OF DEVISED MORTGAGED ESTATES FROM THE MORTGAGE DEBT.

Until the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, commonly known as Locke King's Act, the devise of a mortgaged estate was generally entitled to have the mortgage debt paid out of the testator's personalty in exoneration of the devised land. This rarely accorded with the testator's intention, and was frequently productive of hardship, the testator's widow and children being often left unprovided for, in order that the devisee of the mortgaged estate might take the property free from the incumbrance. To remedy this state of things the above-mentioned Act was passed, by which the mortgaged property is made primarily liable to its own burden, unless a contrary intention is expressed by the testator. What is a sufficient indication of a contrary intention becomes, then, a very important question. The first case in which it arose was that of Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft, 8 W. R. 405, where the testator directed that "all his debts should be paid by his executors out of his estate." And Sir J. Stuart, before whom the case came, decided that mortgage debts were, by virtue of this direction, made payable out of the personalty in exoneration of the devised mortgaged land; for how, argued the learned Judge, could a testator more clearly indicate his intention that the devisee of the mortgaged estate should not be called upon to pay the mortgage debt, than by directing that it should be paid by somebody else? The next case was Pembroke v. Friend, 1 John. & H., 132, in which there was simply a direction that the testator's debts should be paid, but without saying by whom; and Vice-Chancellor Wood held that this was not sufficient to throw the mortgage debt on the personal estate. And the testator, said the Vice-Chancellor, added the words "by my executors," there would have been something on which to build the conclusion that he meant to express an intention that the general statutory rule should not apply; and, on the ground that there were no such words, he distinguished the case before him from Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft, of which, however, he intimated no disapproval. The question next came before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in Stone v. Parker, 8 W. R., 722, where the testator directed that his trustees should hold his residuary real and personal estate, "subject, in the first place, to the payment of his debts, &c.," upon the trust therein mentioned. And the Vice-Chancellor, following and approving of Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft, held that the mortgage debts were thrown on the general residue in exoneration of the mortgaged land. Another case still remains to be mentioned, namely, that of Smith v. Smith, 10 Ir. Ch. R., 89, before the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, where the testator directed that his debts and legacies should be paid out of his residuary personal estate. And this was held sufficient to entitle the devisee of mortgaged property to have the mortgage debt discharged out of the residuary personalty. The last-mentioned case is particularly valuable, because the opinion of the judge was not founded on the preceding cases, which either were not then decided, or were not cited, but was arrived at quite independently of authority. We have, therefore the express decisions of three equity judges—Vice-Chancellor Stuart, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, and the Master of the Rolls of Ireland, that a direction by a testator that his debts should be paid, or that they should be discharged out of his personal estate, is sufficient to throw mortgage debts primarily on the personalty; and although reliance cannot be placed on Pembroke v. Friend as sanctioning the same doctrine, yet Vice-Chancellor Wood certainly intimated no disapproval of it in that case. The doctrine, fortified by such authority, might reasonably have been considered as settled; but unfortunately it may now almost be said, slightly varying the old proverb, "Quot judices et sententia;" and no reliance can be confidently placed except in the decisions of the Court of ultimate appeal. The case of Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft, as will be seen by referring to 9 W. R. 48, has been reversed by the Lord Chancellor. Pembroke v. Friend was referred to as the only other case which had occurred since the Act; and it is very much to be regretted that the case of Smith v. Smith was not mentioned, because the Lord Chancellor evidently had some hesitation in making up his mind; and that case might have turned the scale in favour of the Vice-Chancellor's decision. The authority of the Lord Chancellor's judgment is certainly much diminished by the fact that that case was not brought to his notice; and, although his decision is binding on all inferior courts, yet it is submitted that there are strong grounds for contending that it would not be upheld in the House of Lords. It is a rule of construction, now firmly settled, that the words of a testator should have their ordinary meaning, unless we can discover from the will that he has used them in a different or more limited sense. Now the word "debts," in its ordinary signification, includes debts of every description—debts by simple contract, debts by specialty, and mortgage debts; the only difference existing between these several kinds of debts consisting in the more or less extensive remedies which the creditor has for their recovery. Consequently, when a testator directs his debts to be paid by his executors or out of his personal estate, we are bound, according to the above-mentioned rule, to consider this as a direction that his mortgage, as well as other debts, should be thus paid, unless we can discover on the face of the will that the testator used the word "debts" in a more limited sense. There was nothing in Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft to sanction such an hypothesis; the testator probably did not really intend to throw the mortgage debts on the personalty, but this is not the question. We have only to interpret his words; and it is our duty to give those words their full and ordinary meaning, unless it is clear from the four corners of the will that they were not used in this sense. The Vice-Chancellor's decision gave full effect to the direction that the debts should be paid by the executors, which, if the word "debts" includes mortgage debts, are no longer merely expressive of what the law would otherwise imply. The Lord Chancellor's judgment, however, puts a forced construction on the word "debts," reading it to mean "debts exclusive of mortgage debt;"—and renders the whole of the direction that the debts should be paid by the executors objectless and of no effect. It seems, therefore, to offend against two well settled rules of construction, one of which tells us to read the words of a testator in their ordinary sense, and the other which directs us to give full effect, if possible, to every word and clause in a testator's will.

TRUSTEES RIGHT TO BE RECOUPED IN RESPECT OF BREACH OF TRUST.

Previously to the marriage of A. with B. a sum of £1,200 was settled upon the husband and wife and their issue, and ought to have been invested in the trustees' names in the public funds upon the trusts of the settlement.

This was unfortunately not done, and the husband prevailed upon the trustees from time to time to advance him various sums of money to pay his debts and extricate him from his embarrassments, and he has in the aggregate received the whole of the trust fund.

The trustees, being liable to make good the same will pay the amount into court when required so to do in a suit instituted by one of the family, an infant, against them and their father for the due administration of the estate.

I shall be glad if any of your correspondents can inform me whether on application to the Court by the trustees against the husband, or otherwise, for payment by him into court of the amount received by him would be entertained and successful; and if they can refer me to any precedent on the subject it will be more agreeable.

ROAD MURDER.

One of the grounds of the application of the Attorney-General for quashing the inquisition is that it was made on paper instead of parchment; surely this is untenable. Had the inquisition found that A. B. did murder the child, then undoubtedly parchment should have been used, as it would have at once become matter of record, upon which A. B. would have been indicted. The return of wilful murder against some person or persons unknown never could have become so, whatever further investigations might bring to light; in the latter case, therefore, paper would be sufficient, and granting this difference, the absurdity is not so great as the Times proclaims.

J. S.

THE TRUSTEES MORTGAGEES, &c., ACT.

The powers by this Act made incident to mortgages and charges, are by the 11th section conferred upon "The person to whom such money shall for the time being be payable his administrators, executors, and assigns." This is, of course, an imitation of the not unusual proviso in a mortgage-deed, that the power of sale may be exercised by any person entitled to give a receipt for the purchase money. The effect of this appears to be that if the apparent mortgagee be agent or trustee for another, or assign the mortgage debt, and the mortgagor receive notice that he is no longer authorized to receive the money, he will cease to fill the character to which the powers are annexed, and they will henceforth be exercisable (if at all) by his principal cestui que trust or assignee. Whereas, in an ordinary mortgage deed, the powers are merely equitable. This mode of defining the person by whom they are to be exercised is found to work well, because, although the exercise of the powers by persons to whom the money was not properly payable would not be of any effect between persons with notice, yet a purchaser for value without notice would be safe, provided nothing appeared on the deeds to show that the powers had been exercised by, or the mortgage money repaid to other than the right person. But whenever the mortgagor in a mortgage under this Act shall have the legal estate in him at the time of creating the charge, the 15th and 19th sections will confer legal powers; and it is by no means clear that this vesting of legal powers in a person defined by a purely equitable test will work equally satisfactorily. These legal powers were apparently introduced to enable a legal owner of real estate to confer all the powers of a legal mortgagee by a simple deed of charge, not requiring a reconveyance. But if I am right in holding that as soon as a mortgagor learns that he cannot properly repay the mortgage money to the apparent mortgagee on his sole receipt, the latter ceases to have this power, it is clear that no title can be considered good in which the dissolution of the legal estate depends on this power having been exercised by the proper person; and the only question remaining for consideration is whether a purchaser in possession of the legal estate conveyed by the mortgage deed is safe from the consequences of these powers being kept alive by circumstances of which he has no notice. If a mortgagor or purchaser under a power of sale pay the mortgage money to an apparent mortgagee, with notice that he is not authorized to receive the purchase-money, and through fraud or accident it fail to reach the hands of the proper person, the mortgaged estate would, but for the protection given in equity to purchasers for value without notice, and for the Statute of Limitations, always continue liable to pay the money over again. The person, then, to whom the money was properly payable previously to the improper payment still satisfies that description, and is therefore still entitled to exercise the legal powers of conveying the property after a sale, and of collecting the rents through a receiver; and as these powers extend to "all the estate or interest, which the person who created the charge had power to dispose of," they will take precedence of the legal estate conveyed by the same deed.

The courts of law will probably struggle to put some more limited construction on the words "the person to whom, &c.," but as a satisfactory construction must include "assigns" of the mortgage debt, and must be independent of any legal estate in the mortgaged property, this will be difficult, and any such limited construction will make the equitable powers conferred by the Act less extensive than those of an ordinary mortgage deed.

It is not unusual to convey property to a trustee upon trusts for sale, and for securing loans to more than one lender. In these cases each lender will have all these powers, and as they all arise under the same deed, many curious questions as to priority may arise, if the various lenders quarrel and try to exercise their powers.

Of course, the Act should be expressly excluded from every deed for securing the repayment of money, and in case a clause to that effect should be omitted, care should be taken to preserve satisfactory evidence that the mortgage money was repaid to the proper person, as it is possible that, without such evidence, the fact that a mortgage to which the Act applied had affected the legal estate might be held a valid objection to the title.

SUPREME COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS.

COMMONWEALTH v. IRA TEMPLE.

The legislature, exercising the sovereign power of the State, either by general law or special enactment, have control of all public easements and accommodations for the general benefit.

The right of every one to use the highway is equal, but each is bound to a reasonable exercise of his absolute right.

Where a driver of a waggon made use of the track of a horse-railroad for the wheels of his waggon, and upon the approach of the car behind him, refused to move off the track when requested by the conductor of the car, although he had room and opportunity so to do:

Held, that he was liable to indictment therefore.

Held, also, that if the driver wilfully intended to follow his own convenience, in violation of the equal rights of others, it would be sufficient proof of a malicious motive on his part.

A novel question arose in this case as to the rights of the owners of a street railway—

The following judgment of Shaw, C.J., sufficiently discloses the facts, and is interesting to English lawyers on account of the propositions of law which it contains.

SHAW, C.J.—Since horse-railroads are becoming frequent in and about Boston, and are likely to become common in other parts of the Commonwealth, it is very important that the rights and duties of all persons in the community, having any relations with them, should be distinctly known and understood, in order to accomplish all the benefits, and, as far as practicable, avoid the inconvenience arising from their use. This is important to proprietors and grantees of the franchise, who expend their capital in providing public accommodation, on the faith of enjoying with reasonable certainty the compensation in tolls and fares which the law assures to them; to all mayors, aldermen, selectmen, commissioners or surveyors especially appointed by law for the care and superintendence of streets and highways; to all persons for whose accommodation in the carriage of their persons and property these ways are specially designed; and to all persons having occasion to use the ways through or across which these horse railroad cars may have occasion to pass. These railroads being of recent origin, few cases have arisen to require judicial consideration and no series of adjudicated cases can be resorted to as precedents to solve the various new questions to which they may give rise.

But it is the great merit of the common law, that it is founded upon a comparatively few, broad, general principles of justice, fitness, and expediency, the correctness of which is generally acknowledged, and which at first are few and simple; but which, carried out in their practical details, and adapted to extremely complicated cases of fact, give rise to many, and often perplexing questions; yet these original principles remain fixed, and are generally comprehensive enough to adapt themselves to new institutions and conditions of society, new modes of commerce, new usages and practices, as the progress of society in the advancement of civilization may require.

In the first place, all public easements, all accommodations intended for the common and general benefit, whatever may be their nature and character, are under the control and regulations of the legislature, exercising the sovereign power of the State, either by general law or special enactment. It may be done by a charter, or a special act of incorporation, in case of a bridge over broad navigable waters; or where the necessity for its exercise is of frequent recurrence, it may be by the delegation of power to special tribunals, or municipal government, by general laws.

Again, when the entire public, each according to his own exigencies, has the right to the use of the highway, in the absence of any special regulation by law, the right of each is equal; but as two or more cannot occupy the same place at the same time with their persons, their horses, carriages, and teams, or other things necessary to their use, each is bound to a reasonable exercise of his absolute right in subordination to a like reasonable use of all others; and not to encumber it over a larger space, or for a longer time, to the damage of any other, than is reasonably necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of his own right. If an adjacent proprietor has occasion to stop at his own gate with a carriage or team, if he has occasion to deliver wood, coal, or other necessities; or if he is a trader, to deliver or receive merchandise, he must place his team or carriage, for the time being, in such manner as to obstruct the way for the use of others as little as is reasonably practicable, and remove the obstruction within reasonable time to be determined by all the circumstances of the case.

So in the actual case of the highway. Each may use it to his own best advantage, but with a just regard to the like right of others. Persons in light carriages, for the conveyance of persons only, have occasion, and of course a right, when not expressly limited by law, to travel at a high rate of speed, so that they do not endanger others. But all foot passengers, including aged persons, women, and children, have an equal right to cross the streets, and all drivers of teams and carriages are bound to respect their rights, and regulate their speed and movements in such a manner as not to violate the rights of such passengers. So in regard to drivers of fast and slow carriages; each must respect the rights of the other. Take a single illustration: if a heavily loaded ox-team be passing along a street wide enough for only one carriage, say fourteen feet, and other fast carriages follow, these last must, for the time being, be restrained to their speed, because this necessity results from these circumstances,—the narrowness of the way, and the ordinary slowness of the ox-team ahead. If parties thus travelling in the same direction should come to a portion of the way wide enough for carriages to pass each other, say twenty feet wide, it is obvious that if the driver of the heavy team would turn to either side, it would give the fast team room to pass, whereas, if he should keep the middle, the five or six feet on either side would not permit any carriage to pass.

Now, supposing no impediment should intervene, and no circumstance should render it dangerous for the driver of the slow team to bear off, in our opinion it would be his duty to do so, although it might suit his convenience better to keep in the middle; and his refusal thus to bear off would be an abuse of his own equal and common right, for which, if injurious to another, an action would lie; and, if it was a public highway, the party would subject himself to a public prosecution.

In some few cases, the regulation of the use of the highway is important enough to require a rule of positive law, requiring each traveller, when meeting, to turn to the right of the centre;—in some states to the left. But the circumstances, under which travellers may be placed in relation to each other are so various, that it would be impacticable to prescribe any positive rule approaching nearer to certainty than the rule of common law, that each shall reasonably use his own right in subordination to the like reasonable use of all others.

With these views of the law regulating the use of public ways, we will examine the present case, as it appears on the exceptions.

We understand that a horse-railroad and cars are a modern invention, designed for the carriage of passengers, and though not moving with the speed of steam-cars, yet with the average speed of coaches, omnibuses, and all carriages designed for the conveyance of persons.

The accommodation of travellers, of all who have occasion to use them, at certain rates of fare, is the leading object and public benefit, for which these special modes of using the highway are granted, and not the profit of the proprietors. The profit to the proprietors is a mere mode of compensating them for their outlay of capital in providing and keeping up this public easement.

A franchise for the railroad, which the defendant was accused of obstructing, had been duly granted to the proprietors, which grant included the right to lay down tracks on a public highway, and also to use and maintain horse-cars thereon for the carriage of passengers.

Every grant, by an obvious and familiar rule of law, carries with it all incidental rights and powers, necessary to the full use and beneficial enjoyment of the grant; and when such grant has for its object the procurement of an easement for the public, the incidental powers must be so construed as most effectually to secure to the public the full enjoyment of such easement.

It appears that the proprietors of the horse rail-road having received a franchise, had laid down a railway track, and had procured horse-cars, with suitable conductors, and were in the actual use of the track. The defendant, with a heavily loaded team,—it does not appear whether an ox team, or a horse team,—was on the public street driving from Charlestown to Boston, with one of his wheels on the railroad track, when the cars came up behind him. The defendant's team was moving at the usual rate for teams of that class, but at a less rate of speed than the cars were in the habit of moving. There was room outside the track for either vehicle to pass the other. When the cars came up, the conductor asked the defendant if he would remove his team from the track; he did not, but continued upon it, at the same rate of speed, several hundred feet, and then turned off.

Several things are here to be observed. The cars could only pass on one precise line. The waggon could deviate to the right or to the left, within the limits of the travelled part of the road. The public by the grant of the franchise had granted the right to move on that precise line, and had given to all passengers the right to be carried on that line at the usual rate of speed at which passengers are carried by horses, subject only to occasional necessary impediments. The cars cannot so move and the passengers cannot be so carried, whilst the waggon moves on the track. No impediment is shown to prevent the waggon from turning out. The waggon, therefore, is, for the time being, an unnecessary obstruction of the public travel, and therefore unlawful.

It is stated among the above-mentioned circumstances in the bill of exceptions, as if the two vehicles were upon an equality in this respect, that there was room on either side for either vehicle to turn out, but this is mere illusion, the waggon could turn out, the cars could not: ad impossibilia lex non cogit.

It is said above that it is usual for those in charge of heavy and slow teams to drive them with one wheel on the track, and that they could be driven much more easily in that place than in any other part of the street. This is no justification. Whilst the track was not required for the cars, perhaps the teamster had a right so to use it. But when required for the cars, which could pass in no other mode, he had no legal right to consult his own convenience, to the great inconvenience, the actual injury, of the equal rights of another.

It is no excuse that the defendant did not get upon the track in the first instance with the intention of obstructing the passage of the cars, or that he did not slacken his rate of speed on their approach; it is a nuisance, if, for his own benefit, he violates the rights of others; and if this consists in the violation of a public right, indictment is the appropriate remedy for its vindication and redress. Nor is express malice, a disposition or desire to cause damage to another, as in case of malicious mischief, necessary to the completion of the offence. It is a nuisance if one wilfully seeks and pursues his own private advantage, regardless of the rights of others, and in plain violation of them; it is a wrong done. And as every man must be presumed to intend all necessary, natural and ordinary consequences of his own acts, it is a wilful and intended wrong; it is malice,—a thing done malo animo,—in the sense of the law and no other malice need be proved, to show the act to be a nuisance.

If it be said that the obstruction in this case was very slight, that the cars were delayed but a very short time,—the answer is, that this is very true, and the injury may be trifling in itself, but vindicated and justified as it is in the argument, on the ground of right, it tests a principle of very great importance. If the driver of a heavily loaded truck or wagon may, for his personal convenience, use one rail of the track, wilfully, for a few hundred feet, others may use the other rail for the like purpose, and for any distance which suits their convenience. Cars, which at the ordinary speed of horses in carriages would pass a given space in one hour, may be three or four in accomplishing it. Passengers whose business requires them to be at the place of destination at a fixed time, and who expect, and have a right to expect, that it will be reached in that time, may find their business greatly deranged.

Men who, relying on the establishment of horse-cars for their daily passage, have fixed their domicile in one place and their ordinary place of business in another, may find their plans of life thus defeated. Indeed, without pursuing the effect of the right contended for into all its consequences, the establishment of such a principle might essentially impair the value of real estate in many situations.

FRANCE.—The Civil Tribunal was on Monday called on to decide another case relative to the arrest of a foreigner for debt. The Prince of Salm-Salm was on the 27th of March last lodged in the Debtors' Prison, in the Rue de Clichy, for the non-payment of a sum of 865*fr.*, due to tailors of the names of Bulson and Lange; and on the 23rd of April following another man named Cornet lodged a detainer against him for 2,022*fr.*, in virtue of two judgments of the Tribunals of Commerce obtained in 1859. Yesterday the Prince called on the Civil Tribunal to order his release, on the ground that the tailors had caused him, as a foreigner, to be arrested "provisionally," as it is called—that is, on a simple declaration that he owed them money—but had neglected within a week after to take proceedings to obtain a definite judgment against him, as required by Art. 15 of the law of 1832, relative to arrests for debt; and on Cornet's claim he also applied to be set at liberty because the judgments which that person had obtained had omitted to say how long, in the event of his not paying he was to be kept in prison,—an omission which he contended to be fatal under the said law. The Tribunal, after hearing arguments, decided that the Prince must be set at liberty from the tailor's arrest, but that his other demand could not be granted, a law of 1848 having modified that of 1832 with regard to the point raised.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

ON THE DEFECTS OF OUR JURY SYSTEM.

The following paper was read at a meeting of the Newcastle meeting of this association by Mr. THOMAS GEORGE GIBSON.

The substance of the paper was prepared for the meeting of this society held last October, but a press of other matter prevented its being then read.

The delay is not altogether regretted by the writer, as the publication in the early part of this year of the third report of her Majesty's commissioners for inquiring into the process, &c., of the superior courts of common law, encourages him to direct attention to the subject with a degree of confidence which was before wanting on his part.

It will be generally admitted that a feeling widely prevails that the practical results of our jury system do not entirely harmonise with the expectations which a consideration of the theory would seem to justify. So strongly, indeed, has this been felt in some quarters, that the institution of "trial by jury" has more than once of late years been called upon for its defence.

The common law commissioners entered very elaborately into this general question in their second report presented in 1853. The conclusion they arrived at is expressed as follows:—

"While, however, we feel that there are cases in which a jury may be dispensed with, yet being of opinion that trial by jury on the whole works well and enjoys the confidence of the public, we do not think ourselves warranted, except in cases of mere account, to recommend that trial by jury should be superseded, unless the parties themselves prefer that the case should be tried by a judge."

This decision, however, was not accepted as final, for in the course of last year a learned gentleman, well-known in the profession and much respected, published his views on "The Dark Side of Trial by Jury," in which he informs his readers that,—

"After long reflection on the numerous and heavy grievances which flow from the unlimited application of this form of trial, he is convinced that it is not adapted to the refinement of the age we live in, that it has had its day, and it must soon be thrown aside into the huge heap of antique legal lumber, or limited in its application to a very confined class of cases."

This essay has already been ably answered by Mr. Best and Mr. Fitz-James Stephens (see Juridical Society's Papers, vol. ii. part iii.), and it is not quoted here out of any sympathy with the author's conclusions, but as evidence of that general feeling of dissatisfaction spoken of above, which the writer believes may be in great measure justified without impugning the institution of "Trial by Jury," or any portion of the law as it at present stands on the subject.

The real defect was well and clearly pointed out in the Common Law Commissioners Second Report already referred to, and the existence of this defect has been admitted in every subsequent defence of the jury system that has come under the writer's notice. The commissioners say on

THE CONSTITUTION OF JURIES.

While, however, we are prepared to maintain trial by jury in all cases where facts of a more complicated nature are to be dealt with, we are not blind to the fact that in many instances juries are not so constituted as to insure such an average amount of intelligence as might be desired. A jury of London or Liverpool merchants may be, as we believe them to be, an excellent tribunal to try a commercial cause; or a jury of country gentlemen to try a question relating to a watercourse or the boundaries of an estate; but it must be admitted that in the agricultural districts the common juries are sometimes composed of a class of persons whose intelligence by no means qualifies them for the due discharge of judicial functions. Such persons are unaccustomed to severe intellectual exercises, or to protracted thought, and used to an active out-door life and employment; when shut up for hours in a jury box, bewildered by law terms, by conflicting evidence and the disputations of contending advocates, who appeal to their prejudices, sometimes pronounce verdicts which bring the institution of juries into disrepute; we are of opinion that the standard of qualification of jurymen in the country which is at present as low as a rating on a value of £20 should be raised; and further, that on every trial there should be an admixture of jurymen of the class from which the special juries are now taken. This is indeed now the law, though in practice the names of persons qualified to be special jurors are not placed on the common jury panel. There is every reason why jurors of the higher class should assist in the administration of justice to the same extent as those who constitute the common juries. We think the higher class of jurors should bring the assistance of their more cultivated minds and superior intelligence to the decision of cases which, though they may not admit of the general expense attendant under the present system on having a special jury, may not be the less important to the parties whose interests are involved. At the same time it should be understood that we do not propose to abolish the right which now exists of having a special jury as at present appointed. What we recommend is, that the general jury panel should be made up indiscriminately from all persons qualified to serve on either jury. The same commissioners in their third report, published this year, make the following observations on the same subject:—

"We make it right to avail ourselves of this opportunity to invite renewed attention to our former observations respecting the constitution of juries. More especially we would urge the consideration of that part of our recommendations which relates to securing the attendance on common juries of the class of persons who now serve exclusively on special juries with a view to the improvement of the former by the admixture of persons of higher education and intelligence. We are strongly persuaded that a very great improvement would by this means be effected in the constitution of juries, and as we do not propose to do away with the right of parties to resort to a special jury; or to deprive special jurors when serving as such of the additional remuneration which they are in the habit of receiving, we can see no ground why the liability of such persons to serve on common juries, which already exists in law, though it is not so required in practice, should not be enforced."

The object of the present paper is to call attention to the statutable authority for the assertion that special jurors are by law liable to serve on common juries, and to fix the responsibility of the present defective practice upon the undersheriffs; and secondly, to express a hope that inasmuch as these gentlemen are members of our common profession, some means may be devised by this Society at its present meeting to induce these gentlemen to act in future up to the spirit of the law instead of keeping as at present barely within its letter.

The law of jurors is mainly regulated by the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 50. By the first section of this statute it is provided:—

"That every man except as hereinafter excepted between the ages of twenty-one years and sixty years, residing in any county in England, who shall have in his own name, or in trust for him within the same county, £10 by the year above reprises in lands or tenements, of freehold, copyhold, or customary tenure . . . or who shall have within the same county, £20 by the year above reprises in lands or tenements, held by lease or leases for the absolute term of twenty-one years, or some longer term . . . or who being a householder shall be rated or assessed to the poor-rate, or to the inhabited house duty in the county of Middlesex, on a value of not less than £30, or in any other county on a value of not less than £20, or who shall occupy a house containing not less than fifteen windows, shall be qualified and shall be liable to serve on juries for the trial of all issues, joined in any of the King's Court of Record at Westminster, and in the superior courts, both civil and criminal of the three counties palatine, and in all courts of assize, nisi prius, oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, such issues being respectively triable in the county in which every man so qualified respectively shall reside; and shall also be qualified and liable to serve on grand juries in courts of sessions of the peace, and on petty juries for the trial of all issues joined in such courts of sessions of the peace, and triable in the county, riding, or division in which every man so qualified respectively shall reside."

In Wales the qualification is one-third lower, but in every other respect the liability is the same.

Section 2 exempts peers, judges, clergymen, ministers, teachers, lawyers, medical men, and a few public officers. Sections 4-11 relate to the preparation of the list of persons qualified and liable to serve on juries. It is provided that the clerks of the peace are to issue their process to the high constables, by which the former are to command the latter to issue their precepts to the churchwardens and overseers of the poor requiring them to prepare and make out the lists; the churchwardens and overseers for their assistance in the preparation of the lists are given liberty to inspect the tax-assessments; after allowance by the justices, the lists are to be received by the high constables, and delivered by them to the courts of quarter sessions. Section 12 provides—

"That the clerk of the peace shall keep the lists so returned by the high constable to the Court of Quarter Sessions . . . and shall cause the same to be fairly and truly copied in a book to be provided for that purpose . . . and shall deliver the same book to the sheriff of the county or his undersheriff . . . which book shall be called the 'Jurors Book for year —' (inserting the calendar year for which such book is to be in use), and that every sheriff on quitting his office shall deliver the same to the succeeding sheriff, and that every juror's book so prepared shall be brought into use on the 1st day of January after it shall be so delivered by the clerk of the peace to the sheriff or his undersheriff, and shall be used for one year then next following."

Section 14 provides that every sheriff upon the receipt of every writ of venire facias, and precept for the return of jurors, shall return the names of men in the juror's book for the current year and no others.

Section 30 provides that the courts may order special juries to be struck.

Section 31 provides "That every man who shall be described in the juror's book for any county in England, Wales, or for the county of the city of London, as an esquire or person of higher degree, or as a banker or merchant shall be qualified and liable to serve on special juries in every such county in England and Wales, and in London respectively, and the sheriff of every county in England and Wales, or his undersheriff, and the sheriffs of London, or their secondary, shall within ten days after the delivery of the juror's book for the current year to either of them take from such book the names of all men who shall be described therein as esquires or persons of higher degree, or as bankers or merchants, and shall respectively cause the names of all such men to be fairly and truly copied out in alphabetical order, together with their respective places of abode, and additions in a separate list to be subjoined to the juror's books, which list shall be called 'The Special Jurors' List.'"

Section 35 provides "That no juror who shall serve upon any special jury shall be allowed to take for serving on any such jury more than such sum of money as the judge who tries the issue shall think just and reasonable, and which shall not exceed the sum of £1 ls., except in cases wherein a view is directed."

This being the state of the law, let us now consider how it is commonly applied by the undersheriffs in the execution of precepts for the return of jurors.

The general, if not universal practice in this respect is, and has been for many years, to summon the persons on the "Special Jurors List" only for the trial of issues of an exceptional and special nature, to wit, the issues raised in what are called "special jury actions." By this arrangement, the common jury, which, by a recent writer is said to dispose of nine-tenths of the trials, civil and criminal, which occupy the courts of law, is drawn exclusively from a class of persons to whom no injustice can be done in saying that it comprises the least elevated and least educated portion of the whole body of qualified jurors.

The provision of the statute is that all the persons in the jurors' book are to be liable to serve on juries for the trial of all issues, but in point of fact the only persons who are summoned for the trial of all issues (that is to say, all kinds of issues) are the residue of those names contained in the jurors' book after striking out all the persons qualified to be on the special jurors' list.

The practice in question is not contrary to the letter of the statute, for it only directs the sheriff (sec. 14) to return as jurors the names of men in the jurors' book and no others; and it leaves him a wide discretion as to the selection of jurors within this limit. But it can scarcely be doubted by any one who will read the statute that it was the intention of the legislature to lay the burden of trying in general language all issues upon the general list of persons constituting the jurors' book, and to impose by way of additional duty upon the higher and better educated class, including esquires and persons of higher degree, merchants and bankers, the further task of trying by themselves the more difficult and complex cases.

This is strongly borne out by the nature of the section in the Act, authorizing the payment of special jurors; in fact, the only rational ground on which this provision can be supported consistently with the nonpayment if the common jury, is that every qualified person, without exception, is supposed to take an equal amount of duty upon the common jury; but that the special jury service was intended to be an extra and additional duty performed by a few. Under any other aspect the payment of the special jury, at the same time as you compel the common jury to serve gratuitously, is at once illogical and unjust, while with this key it may be at once reconciled with both reason and justice.

It would be neither difficult nor uninteresting to trace the effects on the administration of justice which a priori considerations might lead us to expect from a system which should throw an overwhelming amount of influence into the hands of any one class of the community, and to compare these results with the objections commonly urged against trial by jury. But to do so would be foreign to the object now in view, which is simply to draw attention to the law as it stands, and the mode in which it is commonly carried out.

The authority of the Common Law Commissioners, four of whom are judges now on the bench, must be taken as conclusively establishing that the present practice is erroneous and objectionable, and there can be very little doubt that it is doomed, and will be altered by authority, if not voluntarily amended by the under sheriffs.

We all profess to be law reformers, and our first duties in law reform, as in all reform, must concern ourselves rather than our neighbours.

It is not often that we, as a profession, have the opportunity of effecting any general legal improvements by our own unaided efforts. Such, however, is really the case in the present instance. The defect pointed out by the commissioners is not in the law but in the practice of the undersheriffs, members of our common profession. And the writer submits, in conclusion, that it is a defect peculiarly within the province of this meeting to discuss with a view to the initiation of some amendment.

ON THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

A paper on this subject by Mr. JAMES ANDERSON, Q.C., was read by that learned gentleman in the Jurisprudence department of the recent Congress at Glasgow. After an historical sketch of the Appellate Tribunal of the Scottish Parliament before the Union, Mr. Anderson proceeded to consider the improvements which might still be made in the present tribunal of ultimate appeal in Scotch cases, as follows:—

1. The chief objection to its constitution is, that it is deficient in permanent judicial strength. The only member whose duty it is to attend is the Lord Chancellor for the time. There may be no other law lords who can attend, or, if there be, their attendance is voluntary, and this is highly objectionable. There ought to be a permanent judicial bench. Each Chancellor should, on taking the seals, be elected a member of this bench. He should remain, notwithstanding he might cease to be Chancellor; and if there were not ex-Chancellors enough to form, with the Lord Chancellor, a Court of at least five, competent persons should be appointed so as to secure always that number.

2. The forms of procedure might be materially simplified. Among other things—

(1.) The petition of appeal and the answer of the respondent should be dispensed with. They are entirely useless. Instead of the petition, the party aggrieved by any judgment should be enabled to appeal by lodging with the Clerk of Parliament a printed copy of the record and proceedings, including the judgment complained of, and by serving on the opposite party a notice that he had done so. On a certificate that this notice had been served on the respondent, the appeal should be set down for hearing,—neither party being obliged to lodge any appeal case.

(2.) The House ought to meet for judicial business when necessary, notwithstanding that Parliament was at the time prorogued or not sitting.

(3.) The notice of appeal should not operate as a stay of execution for more than a limited time—say fourteen days—unless ordered by the Court.

(4.) Incidental questions, when they arise, should be disposed of by motion on notice, instead of by the present expensive and tardy system of petition; and these motions ought to be disposed of at once, either in chambers or at the bar, of the house, instead of being detained for months until an appeal committee is convened, as incidental petitions now are.

(5.) All house dues should be abolished. At present a tax is levied on every step that is taken in an appeal cause—very burdensome to the individual suitor, and productive of very little revenue.

But an important question remains. Can any element be introduced to secure a better knowledge of the law of Scotland in disposing of appeals? Many schemes have been suggested for accomplishing this object.

First, It has been proposed to establish in Scotland an intermediate court of review, so that parties might have the benefit of a deliberate judgment of this intermediate court before incurring the expense of an appeal to the lords. I cannot help thinking that there are already too many intermediate courts—that it is wrong in principle to give parties so many opportunities of having their causes heard and reheard. The court would be more efficient, and more respected if its decisions were conclusive between the parties, subject only to an appeal to the last resort; and I think that either party should be entitled, as soon as the record was closed, to remove it into the Inner House for judgment; and if this were not done, but the judgment of the Lord Ordinary taken, that the unsuccessful party should be at liberty to appeal at once to the House of Lords, as a suitor may in the Court of Chancery from a decree of a Vice-Chancellor without going to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. This would save both time and expense. A judgment of the House of Lords would be obtained as soon as a judgment of the Inner House on a reclaiming note. There is no reason why an appeal to the House of Lords should not be disposed of within three months, during session, after the notice of appeal, which I have suggested, is given.

Second, Another scheme is that a court of last resort should be instituted in Scotland, the jurisdiction being altogether removed from the House of Lords. This project was discussed at the Union, and found favour with many of the commissioners, and so late as 1823, the minister of the day—the Earl of Liverpool—was prepared to bring in a measure for carrying it into effect, and he had the support of a noble lord connected with Scotland, the Earl of Aberdeen. The immediate occasion which led to this measure, was the disproportionate number of appeals from Scotland, which were not unjustly regarded as the main cause of the arrears, not only in the House of Lords, but also in the Court of Chancery. According to returns presented to Parliament, it appeared that, for many years previous to 1823, the average number of appeals each session from England was 5, from Ireland between 8 and 9, and from Scotland 40; in other words, about 75 per cent. of the whole appellate business was from Scotland. A temporary remedy was at that time applied, viz., the appointment of a deputy speaker, Lord Gifford, to dispose of the arrears of Scotch appeals, and the general measure was postponed. Public opinion was opposed to it, and it was justly consigned to oblivion.

A court of last resort to be effective must be the supreme power of the State. No attempt to establish a special tribunal inferior to this power has ever been successful; and the Court of Session, previous to the union, which, in effect, was a court of last resort, is not an exception to the contrary. Probably history does not disclose a more tyrannical, or a more servile and corrupt, tribunal than the Court of Session of 1675, after it had established its claim to supremacy.

The uses of a court of last resort are threefold—1. To decide the particular controversy, so that justice may be done between the parties: 2. To expound the legal principles involved in the cause, so that the law may be rendered clear and certain, and sound precedents established for the decision of future questions. And, in this respect, no one has contributed more to illustrate and enrich the law of his country than the noble and learned president of this Association: 3. But the indirect, though not less important, use of an appeal court consists in the moral influence it has in checking and controlling inferior judges in the administration of their office. The more exalted in rank and dignity, and the higher in power and authority the Appellate Court is, the greater will be this moral influence.

Third. But suggestions have been made for retaining the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and improving it by the introduction, in various ways, of Scottish lawyers.

(1.) It has been proposed that the Scotch judges should be summoned and be present at the hearing of Scotch appeals, as the English judges are on writs of error. They would have neither vote nor voice in the disposal of the cause, but would merely deliver their opinions, which might or might not be followed. I think that this scheme is in many respects objectionable, and that the precedent of the English judges is unsound and ought not to be followed. The House has ample facilities for obtaining the opinions of the Scotch judges, by remit, when thought necessary.

(2.) A proposal has been made that two Scotch judges in rotation should attend, during each session, to inform the House on points of Scotch law, as they might arise; and this scheme received the sanction of a committee of the House of Lords about the year 1813. (See Andrew v. Murdoch, 2 Dow 425.) Nothing could be more unsatisfactory than this system of rotation. The Scotch judges, when they were becoming familiarized with their position, would be relieved from attendance, and fresh minds introduced.

But, irrespective of this consideration, what effect was the opinion of these judges to receive? Was the House to adopt the opinion implicitly, or was it to exercise its own judgment, and act upon the opinion, or reject it, as the House thought right? If the latter course was to be followed, every non-adoption of the opinion would be a censure on the judges as advisers. If the former, the judgment would be the judgment not of the House, but of the two Scotch judges as assessors. The House would merely record their assessors' judgment, and it would be respected according to the degree of respect in which the two judges for the time being were held. Again, what was to be done where the two judges differed in opinion with each other?

(3.) Another modification of this scheme is to have one permanent assessor, who should be detached altogether from the Court of Session. This course is open to the most formidable of the objections last considered. There would indeed be permanency, and no danger of division of opinion; but, on the other hand, the confidence which the public had in the tribunal would altogether depend on the confidence the public reposed in the assessor.

Fourth. There remains for consideration a proposal, which has had the largest amount of support from those who think that a Scotch lawyer should be introduced into the House, viz., that a peerage should be conferred on one who, besides his eminence as a Scotch lawyer, had displayed judicial qualities on the bench, and that this judge should be present on the hearing of all Scotch appeals. It is not suggested that he should sit alone, or that the attendance of the Lord Chancellor or the other law lords should be dispensed with. On the contrary, it is allowed that the House, even as now constituted, with all its imperfections, or supposed imperfections, would form a better court of review than a single Scotch judge, or any number of Scotch judges, sitting either in London or Edinburgh. But what is maintained is, that, by the addition of this Scotch judge, the tribunal would be improved, that the other members of the House would be well informed of any peculiarities in Scotch law which might arise in any given cause, and that much time and labour would thus be saved.

Would this really "improve" the tribunal? Very much the reverse, and it would be no less damaging to the Court below. It would introduce into it a disturbing element. The mind of a judge ought to be perfectly even and calm—free from all external influences, whether for favour or for fear. His office should not only be independent, but permanent and stationary. He should consider himself as having reached the goal of all his aspirations—the zenith of his ambition—having nothing to dread, and nothing to hope for, from the crown or the government.

But this could not be, if he were eligible for promotion to an exalted place, not merely of judicial rank and dignity, but of political power and influence. What a temptation would be thrown out, to the whole bench, so to act as to ingratiate themselves, politically and otherwise, with the minister of the day, and what a temptation to the minister, to select, for this promotion, the judge who should sympathise most with him in political feeling, and who would be most useful as a partizan, irrespective altogether of professional acquirements, or judicial qualifications.

It is contended, however, that much time and labour would be saved. Now it is undoubtedly a feature in the hearing of Scotch appeals, that much more time is occupied and labour undergone than in the hearing of English or Irish appeals, or of the same causes in the Court of Session. Is this time wasted? Is this labour thrown away? Would it be any benefit to the suitor or to the law, if it were avoided or saved? It might indeed be a relief to the law lords. For, to their credit be it spoken, they have not hitherto shrunk from the toil and trouble they found necessary for acquiring a thorough apprehension of a case, however technical. It is worth while to dwell a little on this feature which it is now proposed to obliterate.

Mr. Anderson then referred to the opinions of Lord Hardwick, Lord Eldon, and Lord St Leonards, and continued:—

By the scheme under consideration, the law Lords are to be relieved of all this fatiguing labour, and in lieu thereof, they are to be "informed" of the technical rules of Scotch law by a judge from Scotland. Will this be satisfactory to the country? Will public confidence in the tribunal be increased?

Again, would time be saved? If the hearing be properly conducted, the advocate must address himself to the least informed of his audience, if he wishes to carry them all along with him. The same inductive method, of investigating Scotch peculiarities, must be continued for the Lords other than the Scotch judge; and how is he to be placed on a level with them in matters in which they are his superiors? The house is an Imperial Tribunal, dealing with Scotch and English law alike as matter of law. How is the Scotch Judge, who has been taught to regard English law as fact, to become master of an English point, when it arises, in mixed questions, which are not unfrequent, or when he sits with his colleagues on English or Irish appeals? Again, would any amount of time compensate for the disadvantage he labours under from the want of that practical training in comparative jurisprudence, which his colleagues enjoyed before their elevation?

There is indeed a danger. Where a tribunal consists of more judges than one, there is always a risk of divided responsibility, even where all are placed on a footing. But where one of the number is specially appointed, by reason of some peculiar acquirement, the shifting upon that member the whole responsibility is inevitable. Let it be assumed, according to the conditions of our argument, that a jury of merchants was a fitter tribunal, for enquiring into a disputed question of chemical science, than a jury of chemists. They would, by time and labour, acquire a knowledge of the technicalities of the question, and be possessed of all the materials necessary for a decision, and the verdict would be their verdict. But suppose a chemist were to be added to this jury, in order to explain to his fellow jurors the mysteries of chemical science, time and trouble might indeed be saved; but whose would the verdict be?

Just so in questions of recondite Scotch law; and the higher the reputation of the Scotch Lord for learning, the greater would be the danger. He would consider elementary, explanations proper and necessary for the other law Lords to enable them, step by step, to form conclusions for themselves. He could not fail to indicate his impatience, and the other Lords would, in spite of themselves, avoid the labour which their colleague did not require, and would take from him, whether right or wrong, the results at which he had arrived. Their presence might be dispensed with, and the Scotch law Lord might sit alone in the House, or, what would be better, he might sit in Edinburgh, for he would not have occupation enough in London to fill up his time, or to keep up his familiarity with the law of Scotland. Better at once to declare the judgments of the Court of Session to be final and conclusive.

Further, assuming that there was no undue deferring, suppose that the law Lords should form an opinion of their own, opposite to that expressed by the Scotch judge, would it not be considered that the judgment proceeded on English notions, and was opposed to the law of Scotland, as expressed by the Scottish authority placed there for the purpose of expounding that law?

It was at one time in contemplation to confer a peerage on the late Lord Corehouse, with the view of his assisting in the hearing of Scotch appeals. Probably no person in modern time was more eminently qualified for the judicial office—an accomplished scholar, a profound lawyer, having, in the highest degree, the quality of judicial discrimination, the faculty of seizing at once the strong points of an argument. The opinion of this sound thinking man on such a question is of the greatest value, and we are fortunately in possession of it. Sir John Romilly, in his evidence before the Appellate Jurisdiction Committee of the House of Lords in 1856, informs us:—"I remember his (Lord Corehouse) telling me that he thought nothing had been more advantageous to the law of Scotland than the fact that, since the time of Queen Anne, there had been an appeal to the House of Lords; that it had exercised a most beneficial influence. I asked him whether it would not have been better if there had been a Scotch lawyer in the Court of Appeal? He said no; he was of opinion that it would have been worse. I remember distinctly his stating to me his view, that the effect produced by the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, had been most beneficial with respect to the administration of the law of Scotland.—Report, p. 161.

Is there, then, no other way of infusing into the tribunal a better knowledge of Scotch law? What is the cause of the ignorance which is said to prevail? It is that the members of the tribunal have not been educated in the law of Scotland. Why should this cause not be removed?

I think the time has come when English law should cease to be regarded in Scotland, and Scotch law in England, as foreign law, to be proved like any matter of fact. When one considers the great and growing intercourse, social and commercial, of the two countries, the ties by which the people are bound together, it is perfectly unaccountable how the present system should have been tolerated so long. No English law is taught in your schools in Scotland, nor Scotch in England. The law of Scotland is a sealed book to the English, and the law in England to the Scotch lawyer. Nay more, ignorance of the law of the sister kingdom is positively encouraged and inculcated by both systems. It is the duty of an English lawyer, when he meets with a Scotch point, in advising a client, to abstain from meddling with it, and the same duty is incumbent on the Scotch lawyer in reference to points of English law.

In like manner, if we except the Appellate Tribunals, judges in the courts of both countries scrupulously avoid dealing, each with the law of the other. They require only results to be verified, and any knowledge of the law, thus thrust upon them, is got merely with a view to the disposal of a particular question, and is discharged from the mind and memory as soon as that question is disposed of. The consequence is that the mind of the lawyer runs in one groove—that of the municipal law of his own country. Whereas, if there were an education in both systems—if the Scotch lawyer were educated in the knowledge of English law, and had to inquire into it, when it arose, according to principle and authority, he would acquire the more liberal views which are imparted by the study of comparative jurisprudence; and the English lawyer, when he was engaged in appeals from Scotland, would have more confidence in himself. He would be guided in his preparation by the systematic knowledge he had acquired, and, ultimately, the Appellate Tribunal would consist of members entirely free from the imputation of having had no education, and no experience, in the law of Scotland, before their elevation to their high office.

And what reasonable objection can there be to the education of the English lawyer in Scotch law, and the Scotch in English. It has been said that it would tend to confound the principles and confuse the boundaries of the two systems. If by this is meant that there would be a progressive assimilation, it does not strike me that the confusion would be much to be lamented. And there can be no doubt that the differences and contrasts of the two laws are aggravated and prolonged, by the ignorance, of lawyers, reciprocally, of the laws of the sister kingdom. Nor would there be any danger of the Scotch law being merged into the English. On the contrary, I think that there would be a larger adoption of Scotch law in England, than of English law in Scotland; for in many respects the law of Scotland is more simple, and more logical, than the law of England.

But the objection appears groundless in fact. There will be no difficulty in preserving the boundaries of the two laws, or in distinguishing between their respective rules and principles. As well may it be said that a geographer should be confined to the study of only one of the hemispheres, in case he might confound the Alps with the Andes, or Lake Superior with the Lake of Geneva.

The course of modern legislation has tended to aggravate this mischief. By a recent Act of Parliament, the Scotch Court is enabled to refer for the decision of a Court in England, any question of English law arising before it, and vice versa an English Court may take the same course for the decision of a point of Scotch law. This is undoubtedly an improvement on the old system of examining lawyers as witnesses, assuming always that the law, to be inquired into, is to be regarded as foreign, or as matter of fact. But it is an alteration in the wrong direction. It removes further from the Bench and Bar of either country a knowledge of the law of the other. Under the former system, when there was conflicting testimony of lawyers, the reasons of their opinion, and the authorities by which these were supported, were given, and became evidence, and the investigation of these reasons and authorities led the judge to enquire for himself what was a right decision according to principle and authority. The masterly judgment of Lord Stowell, in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, is a striking instance in point. Although it be merely the conclusions deducible from a body of evidence, yet nowhere is there to be found a more lucid exposition of the principles, or more accurate examination of the authorities, of the law of Scotland as to the constitution of the marriage contract.

I have thrown out these suggestions in the hope that such improvements may be effected, in the constitution of the tribunal, and its procedure, as will secure to it, the three great properties—the cardinal virtues of a Court of Justice—certainty of decision, simplicity, cheapness, and vnder it, if not perfect as an institution, of least worthy of being the last resort in the administration of that law, whose greatest glory is, that it is no respecter of persons—that while the mightiest are not beyond its power, the meanest are not beneath its protection.

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS OVER PRIVATE PROPERTY AT SEA.

A paper on the above subject was read at the Glasgow meeting of this Association, by Mr. W. J. LAMFORT.

The declaration of the congress of Paris in 1856, to the effect that "the flag shall cover the cargo," or, in other words, that an enemy's property shall be held free from capture when carried in a neutral ship, excited little attention at the time; or, so far as it excited attention, was regarded as a step forward in civilization.

But an unsuspected, though when once pointed out extremely obvious consequence has since been perceived to follow from it.

No sooner did disturbances in continental politics make it possible that England might be entangled in war, than it became evident that British ships were henceforth at a disadvantage in competition with ships sailing under the flags of countries not expected to be drawn into hostilities. Merchants in foreign and colonial ports, where a choice of flags could be made, immediately avoided British ships, and gave their cargoes to ships of other nations, influenced by the immunity from capture enjoyed in the neutral ship compared with the liability to capture in the British ship. Instances were even known in which American ships were chartered in England by English merchants to bring cargoes home from ports in British India at rates of freight double those obtainable for British ships at the same time.

Temporary loss thus flung upon British shipowners opened their eyes to the still more serious prostration and ruin which they may have to encounter when war actually breaks out.

The question might at first sight seem to be one for the shipowner only. But, once stirred, the commercial and monetary interests all over the country became suddenly roused to an identity of danger; and merchants and bankers both at home and in the colonies made common cause with shipowners.

Memorials and deputations to the Government followed. It was hopeless, were it desirable, to undo what the congress of Paris had done, and the prayer was, that yet another step forward might be taken, and that at the then shortly expected congress of the great powers, the representative of this country might be instructed by her Majesty's Government to support a proposition to the effect that ships and their cargoes, not being contraband of war, shall hereafter be held altogether free from capture, except when attempting to break a blockade.

The press, with a marked and powerful exception, has for the most part pronounced in favour of this proposition. The late select committee of commons on merchant shipping has reported in a sense favourable to the same side of the question. And, significantly enough, some of the loudest cries in its favour have come from mercantile bodies in foreign countries whose shipowners might have been expected to seek their interest in the maintenance of the existing state of the law.

I attempt simply to place before the section a sketch of the present state of the discussion. I pretend to no originality of statement or argument.

The following tabular statement is intended to show the legal position of merchant ships and cargoes, the property of subjects of belligerent states, not contraband of war, nor attempting to break a blockade, under three different states of the law:—

1. Under the law as it stood before the Paris declaration of 1856.
2. Under the law as it stands altered by the Paris declaration.

3. Under the law as it will stand, when, by the further alteration now sought for, such ships and cargoes shall be held free from capture.

1. (PAST).	2. (PRESENT).	3. (FUTURE.)
Ships and cargoes were liable to capture under any flag.	Ships are liable to capture. Cargoes are liable to capture under a belligerent flag, but free from capture under a neutral flag.	Ships and cargoes will be free from capture.

GENERAL RESULTS AS TO SHIPS.

Ships of the most powerful naval belligerent sailed under convoy. Ships of the least powerful naval belligerent were laid up in port in order to avoid almost certain capture.	Ships of both belligerents are laid up in port.	Ships of both belligerents will traverse the seas unmolested.

GENERAL RESULTS AS TO CARGOES.

Cargoes were carried in belligerent and in neutral ships almost indifferently, as in time of peace, so far as they could be carried at all. But the sea commerce of the least powerful belligerent was almost extinguished.	Cargoes are carried in neutral ships.	Cargoes will be carried in belligerent and in neutral ships almost indifferently, as in time of peace.
---	---------------------------------------	--

Looking, then, at the probable results of a war from our own point of view, as being that of the belligerent possessing at once the most powerful war navy and the largest mercantile marine, it would seem that the effect of the declaration of 1856 has been—1st. To deprive England of the superiority which her more powerful war navy would otherwise give her in protecting her own sea commerce and in destroying the sea commerce of her less powerful enemy—and, 2nd. To deprive her shipowners of the use of their ships, and her commercial and consuming population of the benefit of the competition of those ships with neutrals; thus depriving England of the vantage ground she occupied in former wars, and reducing her in these respects to the level of any inferior opponent.

On the other hand, if private property at sea be altogether secured against capture, the effect (and so far as I know the only positive and proximate effect) will be, that the legitimate commerce of belligerents, when not interrupted by blockade, may be carried on in belligerent as well as in neutral ships, and that the merchantseamen of belligerents may be employed on board merchant ships under their respective national flags, instead of on board neutral merchant ships, or in their respective war navies. England will thus recover the advantages derivable from her larger mercantile marine, while her manufacturing and consuming interests will still retain all advantages in respect of uninterrupted commerce already conferred on them by the Paris declaration. The power given her in former wars by her more powerful war navy to annihilate the commerce of her enemy will, it is true, continue to be lost to her. That power was deliberately parted with in 1856, and cannot now be recalled.

I contend, then, that of all nations England suffers and will suffer most from the present state of international law on this subject, and will derive most benefit from the perfect immunity of floating private property from capture.

Yet we have been told, on authority heavy with the weight of eminent names, that England is vitally concerned in the maintenance of the present state of the law; and that to change it in the sense proposed will be to abandon our power to inflict disaster on the commerce of our enemies. The arguments brought forward in opposition to the change, so far as I have been able to apprehend them, are the following:—

1. The object in war is to injure an enemy. So far as we give up the power to do this, so far we cripple ourselves.

I reply, that the power proposed to be given up in this case is no longer worth retaining. The power to injure an enemy in respect of floating property was virtually given up in 1856, save in so far as the enemy's merchant ships may be surprised at sea by the outbreak of war, and captured before they can get into port. Ships and cargoes found thus floating, once disposed of by capture, destruction, or escape, the merchant ships of the belligerents will thenceforward lie safe in port, while their cargoes will be carried with immunity under neutral flags.

The right proposed to be abandoned is consequently a merely nominal right. On the other hand, let the change now advocated be made, and our naval preponderance, with the right of blockade, will still enable us to exclude or to shut up the enemy's merchant ships from or in the enemy's ports, while our own merchant ships can traverse the seas unmolested. Even the temporary destruction of property when war first breaks out will inflict on England more loss than she can inflict on an enemy. She has interests afloat larger than those of any other nation, and these will be exposed to the ravages of steam cruisers, against which no preponderance of naval power can effectually guard.

This is a mercantile and ship-owning question. The trading classes must be content to suffer for the benefit of the whole community.

It remains to be shown how the community will benefit by this loss to the trading classes; or how the community can escape when the trading classes suffer.

3. Private property found on land by an invading army is not thus respected.

In all recent European conflicts, private property has been respected on land, except in so far as it may have been required to supply the immediate necessities of an invading army. We never hear of prize-money derived by the soldiers of an army from the confiscation of private property.

4. Our naval officers and seamen must have the prospect of prize-money to stimulate them to exertion.

Our army require no such stimulus. Moreover, the declaration of Paris has already taken away the prospect of prize-money from our navy, except in respect of captures made of ships surprised by the outbreak of war.

5. The compulsory inactivity of British merchant ships will throw a much needed supply of seamen into the British war navy.

The enormously high freights which neutral shipowners will earn by the sudden withdrawal of the whole British mercantile marine from competition in the carrying trade, and the inability of neutral nations all at once to supply native crews for the extra tonnage called into existence by this demand for neutral ships, will enable and induce neutral shipowners to bid successfully against the British war navy for the services of British merchant seamen. America will probably supply the largest amount of neutral tonnage, and owing to identity of language and habits, British seamen are more likely than Continental seamen to be absorbed into American ships. The British navy is more dependent on a mercantile marine for a continuous supply of seamen than is the navy of any continental power, and will suffer more from an interruption of that supply; especially as this interruption will be lasting, inasmuch as boys will cease to be trained for the British merchant service when all British ships are laid up in port.

6. The continental powers will not agree to alter the law.

In a message to the United States' Congress in 1856, President Pierce stated that the Emperor of Russia entirely and explicitly approved of a proposition that private property on the high seas shall be exempt from seizure; and that similar assurances had been received of the disposition of the Emperor of the French. Austria is interested in the change by her large mercantile marine compared with her small war navy. The disposition of Prussia is probably indicated by favourable opinions already expressed in other parts of Germany.

7. America will never agree.

This very proposition was formally made by America in 1856, though it was afterwards withdrawn. But the concurrence of America is not important, except in the case of war with America, a contingency in the highest degree improbable.

8. An agreement so made at an European congress will not be kept when war breaks out.

Then why enter into the agreement involved in the Paris declaration of 1856? The same declaration abolished privateering.

I have not yet met with any reasonings on the opposite side which cannot be resolved into one or other of these arguments. I may possibly hear others more convincing to-day. If not, I earnestly commend to the consideration of the association the proposition "that ships and their cargoes, not contraband of war, shall hereafter be held free from capture, except when attempting to break a blockade." The prospect of an early European congress has for the present passed away. But so has the apprehension of immediate war. Time and calm are thus afforded for a complete and temperate discussion of the subject.

Reviews.

A Treatise on the Law of Marriage, and other Family Settlements, with Precedents and Practical Notes. By JAMES PEARSE PEACHEY, of the Inner Temple, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: H. Sweet. 1860.

A new work on the law of marriage and family settlements has been long demanded by the profession. The long promised volume on that subject in the Jarman and Bythewood series, still, as far as we know, exists only in promise, and it appears now to be doubtful whether it will ever become an actual existence. Mr. Peachey, therefore, in undertaking a task of great magnitude and importance, had the satisfaction of knowing that its accomplishment was a professional desideratum. The amount of the labour involved may be conceived from the fact that Mr. Peachey's book contains more than 1000 pages, of which 648 are devoted to the treatise, the remainder consisting of precedents and an index. We can hardly pretend, with justice to the author, to offer any detailed criticism of such a work, and shall therefore content ourselves with giving some account of its general plan and scheme. Starting with a slight sketch of the origin of settlements of real estate, Mr. Peachey proceeds to consider the restrictions upon the general capacity to make settlements, and the validity of settlements of real and personal estate when made by infants. He then treats of marriage agreements, and of the Statute of Frauds, and fraud and misrepresentation generally, as affecting them. From marriage agreements he goes on naturally to the subject of settlements pursuant to marriage articles, and executory trusts and wills. Next we have a chapter on settlements in derogation of marital rights, followed by one on the equity of a wife to a settlement. Then comes a chapter on settlements as affected by the 13 Eliz. c. 5, and by the bankrupt laws, followed by one on settlements as affected by 27 Eliz. c. 4. These include the whole subject of fraudulent preference and voluntary conveyances. The subjects of the wife's separate use, and of pin money, finish what appears to be the first part of Mr. Peachey's general division, and may be considered in some sense as introductory to the actual work of a conveyancer in drawing marriage settlements. That being so, having thus led up to the actual draft, Mr. Peachey next shapes his course by its requirements; and we have accordingly chapters on limitations, powers to jointure, portions, and on the covenants usually found in such deeds. Proceeding upon this plan, having said all that he had to say upon the subject involved in the draft itself, he proceeds to the subjects of the rectification of settlements, and of family arrangements and resettlements; and fitly enough, especially according to modern experience, winds up his entire treatise on marriage settlements by a chapter on deeds of separation. If we selected any part of this very elaborate treatise as being most creditable to Mr. Peachey—which assuredly the entire work is—we should especially mention the chapters on Portions and on Double Portions, which are extremely well done; and as original contributions will be very acceptable to lawyers.

The precedents are, perhaps, not the least valuable portion of the book; they are carefully selected, and have been framed with regard to the many recent alterations of the law affecting settlements.

There are throughout the work very abundant evidences of the laborious industry and care of the author; and the reported cases appear to have been noted by him down to the date of publication.

A Manual of the Statutes of Limitation, showing the time within which the ownership of property must be asserted and exercised, or a writ or suit commenced, to prevent the operation of these statutes, viz., barring, the remedy for obtaining, or extinguishing the right to such property. By JAMES WALTER, Esq., Solicitor, and Member of the Incorporated Law Society. Shaw and Sons, London, 1860.

This very useful manual is accompanied by a chart or table of statutes which may be hung up in an office, and will be found extremely convenient for reference. Mr. Walter's observations on the various statutes are those of a thoughtful and sensible practitioner, and are always pertinent.

The Act to further amend the Law of Property (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38) with introductions and practical notes, and with further notes on 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35. By SYLVESTER JOSEPH HUNTER, of Trinity College, Cambridge; and of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-law. Butterworths. 1860.

Mr. Hunter is already well known to the profession, as the author of an edition of Lord St. Leonards' Law of Property Act, 1859, and of several other useful works.

The brochure now before us contains an edition of Lord St. Leonards' Act of last session, with explanatory observations and references to authorities bearing upon the points under consideration.

Obituary.

WALTER COULSON, ESQ., Q.C.

This gentleman died on the morning of the 21st instant. He was called to the bar by the Honorable Society of Gray's Inn in November, 1828, but practised chiefly as a conveyancer. Many years since he was appointed Parliamentary Counsel to the Home Office, and in 1851, was appointed one of Her Majesty's Counsel.

CURRENT TOPICS.

We notice in a Belfast newspaper the following letter relative to the withdrawal of the petitioners' counsel in the Shedden case :—

"London, 23rd November, 1860.

"MY DEAR SIR—I have read the article in the Belfast Daily Mercury, which you have been so good as to send me, in which my name is mentioned as one of the counsel in a cause of Shedden v. Patrick, and in which the conduct of the bar in that case is spoken of as 'disgraceful.'

"The conduct of a public body, such as is the bar, must always be open to, and be benefited by, fair and truthful criticism; but I cannot help regretting that a useful and natural reference to an interesting legal trial should be marred by a wholly inaccurate and unfounded charge against some of those connected with it.

"So far as I am concerned, the case is simply this. A little more than forty-eight hours before the day fixed for hearing the cause of Shedden v. Patrick, I was requested to conduct the case as one of the counsel for the plaintiffs. The Court before which it was to be heard is one in which I do not generally practise, and the papers in the case were of a most voluminous and complicated description. Under these circumstances I deemed it improper to accept the very large remuneration usual on such occasions, unless I could, consistently with pre-existing engagements, devote to the case time and attention such as it required. I therefore stated—and, in order to prevent mistake, I stated in writing—that, if a postponement of the case for some days could be obtained, I would undertake to make myself master of it, and that I would concur in an application for this postponement; but that if—as appeared not improbable—the application for a postponement should be refused, I could not accept the brief.

"I accordingly joined in requesting the Court to postpone the hearing; and, this request being unsuccessful, I retired from the case.

"Our profession is occasionally charged with undertaking more business than can properly be attended to; but it is something new to find an opposite course made a subject of complaint.—Believe me, yours faithfully,

"H. M. CAIRNS."

As far as Sir Hugh Cairns individually is concerned, this forcible, yet most temperate, justification will be conclusive. We are unable to say whether the other counsel stood in an exactly similar position; but we believe the profession, and that portion of the public which is capable of estimating fairly an advocate's responsibilities, are willing to give them credit for the best motives. In forming any opinion upon the subject, it ought not to be forgotten that Miss Shedden herself exhibited in court some evidence of a readiness, if not a desire, on her part to take the opening of the case into her own hands. Sir C. Cresswell intimated pretty plainly in the course of the case that this was his view.

In the interest of the public the withdrawal of the petitioners' counsel is doubtless on one account to be regretted; it led to the protraction of the proceedings beyond all reasonable bounds. Probably, before the fourteen days' sitting was over, the Court often lamented its refusal to postpone the hearing, and allow counsel to prepare themselves to conduct the case.

Information was received by the last Indian mail of the death of Sir Henry Davison, the Chief Justice of Madras. It is only about two years since he received his appointment, and his comparatively early death is said to be attributable to the effects of the Indian climate. Sir Henry Davison was known to the profession in this country as one of the authors of Davison and Merivale's, and of Gale and Davison's Reports.

The sittings after term of the Court of Chancery commenced on the 4th instant. The number of appeals for hearing before the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices was only 13, of which 8 have been set down since the commencement of Michaelmas Term. The total number of causes set down for hearing before the different Courts is 322, viz., before the Master of the Rolls 109; before Vice Chancellor Kindersley 43; before Vice Chancellor Stuart 80; and before Vice Chancellor Wood 90. Not much progress has yet been made in the disposal of business in any of the Courts.

THE CASE OF LANEUVILLE v. ANDERSON.

The number of Englishmen possessing property who reside more or less permanently in France is large, and the questions of international law arising upon their testamentary dispositions are many and difficult. The first question in such cases is usually that of domicile, and this question must be determined by applying to a mass of disputed and perhaps remote facts certain rules which have been established by frequent and costly litigation. The application of these rules has so often disappointed the expectations of families and the evident intention of testators, that they have at length become sufficiently familiar to practitioners, and future miscarriages are only likely to occur through the folly of testators who choose to be their own lawyers. But there are many interesting and by no means obvious consequences arising from the rule that the law of the domicile governs the succession to personal estate; and the case upon which we now propose to comment is well worthy of attention for the light which it throws on some of them.

The judgment lately given in this case by Sir C. Cresswell after several days' elaborate argument, and after mature deliberation by the judge, has for the present terminated a litigation which has occupied the French and English courts for upwards of ten years. The testator, William Anderson, died at Paris in 1849, leaving an English will made in 1843, and a French will made in 1848. By the English will the testator gave a money legacy to a cousin, and subject thereto he gave all his real estate in Ireland and elsewhere, and he gave certain enumerated particulars, and all his personal estate, to his nephew William Anderson, one of the defendants in the present cause. By the French will the testator instituted "pour légataire universelle" Madame Burthé, and named "pour exécuteur testamentaire" M. Guichard, avocat, of Paris, the other defendant in the cause. The first question that arose was that of domicile, which was obstinately litigated in England. The Prerogative Court decided that the testator, at the times of making his will in 1848, and of his death, was domiciled in France, and this decision was affirmed on appeal by the Privy Council. The testator's nephew, William Anderson, had contended for an English domicile. If he had made out his case, the will of 1848, which was a holograph will valid according to French law, would have been declared invalid for want of the attestation of witnesses required by the English statute. But as the testator's domicile was held to have been French, it followed that the will of 1848 was good. As regards the will of 1843, it appears to have been held that at the time of making that will also the testator was domiciled in France. If he had been then domiciled in England, and had afterwards changed his domicile to France, what would have been the effect of that change upon the validity of the English will? In order to answer this question we must first consider by what law should the effect of the change be estimated, and it appears that the law to be appealed to is that of the testator's domicile at his death, viz., the law of France. What then does that law require in the case of one who has become domiciled in France after having made a will in the country of his former domicile, with reference to the validity of such a will? We believe that the French law will be satisfied with the forms of the prior domicile. If this be so, it follows that this testator's will of 1843 would have been valid according to the law of France, even if he had changed his domicile after making it. Sir C. Cresswell, however, appears to have considered that this will would have become inoperative by the change of domicile for want of the forms required in the new domicile; and perhaps this is the rule of English law, to which by a momentary forgetfulness the judge seems to have appealed. However, as the domicile was held to have been changed before 1843, the nice question which we have been pursuing did not arise. The point to be considered was, what does the French law prescribe as to the wills of those who are subject to it? Now that law admits the validity of a will made abroad with the forms of the country where it is made; and, therefore, the testator, a domiciled Frenchman, having in 1843 made a will in England in the English form, that will was held valid by the law of France, the country of the testator's domicile at his death. We have thus far pursued this question because a better illustration could not be found of the difficulties of the law of domicile. And now, to return to our more immediate subject, we find the result to be that, so far as regarded the formalities demanded by the French law, both wills were good; and it remained to consider whether both could stand together, or whether they were inconsistent, in which case the latter would prevail.

It was contended by the representatives of Madame Burthé, who was now dead, that the second will disposed of all the testator's property in a manner at variance with the former will, which it therefore revoked by implication although not expressly. It was further contended that upon this point the Court ought to adopt the decision which had been given by a French tribunal, to which it properly belonged to decide what was the last will of a domiciled Frenchman. Sir C. Cresswell delivered his opinion in conformity with the French judgment, and he thus avoided the necessity of deciding whether or not he would have been bound by that judgment in case he had disapproved of it. The defendant Anderson contended that the language of the second will showed that it was confined to property in France. Upon the legal meaning and effect of this will, the Court was assisted by the evidence of eminent French lawyers. The result of that evidence was that the words "légataire universelle" taken by themselves would make Madame Burthé legatee of all the testator's property; but if these words were preceded by specific legacies, or by a gift in general terms of an entire share of the testator's property—the "legs particulier," or "legs à titre universel" of the code—then the words "légataire universelle" would be equivalent to "residuary legatee," and would not be incompatible with the former part of the will. Again, if a first will gave specific legacies, and made no "légataire universel," and a second will instituted a "légataire universel," the two would not be incompatible, but the general expression in the second will would be explained and controlled by the first. Again, if a first will gave specific legacies, and appointed a "légataire universel," and a second will merely appointed a "légataire universel," he would be considered as substituted for the first, and the specific legacies given by the first will would not be revoked. But if a second will appointing a "légataire universel" contained words showing that the technical expression was used in its primary sense, and that the intention was to give all to the legatee, then it was incompatible with any different disposition in a former will, and of necessity revoked it. The argument for the defendant Anderson, founded upon these distinctions of the French lawyers, appears to have been this—that the bequests to Anderson in the English will were specific, followed by a general residuary bequest, and that as, upon the construction contended for by that defendant, the French will only applied to property in France, both the specific bequests and the residuary bequest of the English will must still have their full effect as to all the testator's property out of France. It appears tolerably plain, however, that the English will contained a mere enumeration of particulars followed by general words, and that the whole amounted to no more than an ordinary residuary bequest. But even supposing the argument founded on the alleged specific character of the bequest to be untenable, there still remained the general clause dealing with all the property; and it was contended that this residuary bequest was not revoked as to property in England by the gift by the French will of property in France only. The question thus raised would have been a difficult one; but Sir C. Cresswell was not called upon to decide it, because he held that in the second will the testator had used the words "légataire universelle" in their primary sense, as indicating that the legatee was to take all his property everywhere; and, therefore, those words were incompatible with the former will, and, as far as regarded personal property, would revoke it. The judgment upon this point turned on a minute verbal criticism of the French will, upon which the defendant's counsel had argued very ingeniously against what appears to be its plain meaning.

Another difficult question arose as to the right of Guichard, the "exécuteur testamentaire," named in the will of 1848, who now claimed probate of that will in England. There had been a dispute between the three representatives of Madame Burthé, the "légataire universelle" named in the will, and Guichard seems to have been put forward by one of those representatives in opposition to the two others. This latter question, therefore, was litigated among the representatives of Burthé, whereas the former question lay between those representatives and Anderson. There had been a judgment of a French court in 1856 upon the claim which Guichard had assented to intervene in his quality of executor. The grounds of that judgment were that Guichard was appointed executor, but without what is called seisin; that the testator's domicile was French, as had been decided in 1854 by the English Privy Council, and therefore the nature and extent of the office of executor conferred on Guichard must be estimated by French and not by English law, even for property situate in England; and that if the quality of executor can, under certain circumstances, continue beyond one year, it cannot continue indefinitely and without utility to the realization of the intention of the testator. It was on these grounds declared that the executorship of Guichard was expired, and that he had no title to meddle in the affairs of the succession either in France or England. After two unsuccessful appeals against this French judgment, Guichard now sought to obtain a contrary decision from the English Court of Probate. It was contended by his counsel that the right of an executor with reference to property in England must be determined by English law; and as Guichard's appointment was general, and not for a limited time, the Court must still treat him as executor, entitled to all the rights which the English law allows. With regard to the observation that the appointment of executor in a French will is for a year only, it was answered that the grant of probate of French wills by the Prerogative Court had always been general, whereas if the appointment was for a year only the grant of probate should have been limited to that time. It was admitted by Sir C. Cresswell that the practice had been as stated. If immediately after the death of a testator domiciled in France the executor were to apply to the English Court for probate, a difficult question might arise whether such probate ought to be—as in practice it had hitherto been—general, or whether it should be limited to a single year. But in the present case the time within which the function of executor should have been discharged had expired, and under such circumstances Sir C. Cresswell considered himself to be bound by the decree of the French Court; and therefore he rejected Guichard's claim to probate.

It appears from this case, that if an executor dies domiciled in France, the duration of the power of the executor named in the will must be defined by the French law, even as regards property in England. It also appears that the construction of such a will, and the decision of all questions as to the rights of legatees under it, belong to the French Courts. It is true that Sir C. Cresswell did not expressly decide this point, but he quoted a judgment of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, which lays down the principle, that in the case of a domiciled subject of France, "the courts of that country are the competent authority to determine the validity of his will, and the succession to his personal estate."

The necessarily restricted application of this Act, as well as the difference between both the estate and indemnity of a purchaser, under the statutory and under the ordinary powers of a mortgagee, formed the subject of a recent article. Other effects of the peculiar frame of the leading sections in Part 2 of the Act also gave us grounds for animadversion. On the same occasion, the principles of parliamentary conveyancing were touched upon in their general policy. As regards the particular principle on which the Trustees and Mortgagees Act is based, or rather professes to be based, Lord Cranworth and the Legislature did not proceed without authority. An idea had for some time prevailed among conveyancers and practitioners of great repute, that while such measures as the Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act, and the 8th & 9th of Vict., making land lie in grant as well as in livery, were the proper means of simplifying the nature of instruments, the statutory incidence of powers to estates, rather than the symbolical system attempted by Lord Brougham's Lease and Conveyance Acts, was the true machinery for shortening the matter of deeds. Thus, when in 1850 Mr. Christie was asked by the commissioners sitting to consider the registration of deeds and the simplification of the forms of conveyance, if he held any opinion whether anything could be done in the way of shortening conveyances by annexing incidents to particular subjects, he answered:—"I can very well fancy that something could be done in that way. I think something might be done. You might say, that whenever a trust for sale was created, it should empower the trustee to exercise this and that discretion. But then I would do it in the mode of annexing that to his office, not in the form we were referring to, of saying it should have the effect of such and such words. I would let the Legislature say in its own words what it means to enact on the subject." And on being questioned whether, in the case of mortgage, he would say such and such consequences should follow from the transaction, his opinion was that certainly something might be done; and that the mode he had mentioned was the true mode in which conveyances should be shortened. But Mr. Christie thought that much could not be done in the powers of sale and exchange. It would require so much handling in most cases, that he doubted whether they must not be let alone.

It ought not, however, to be supposed that, in order safely thus to lighten the wordy burden of assurances by the substitution of matter of public general enactment for matter of private contract in each case, it would be sufficient to take the powers and provisions of even the most approved forms, and to turn them into the sections of an Act. A different sphere is entered. The characters of the transplanted clauses and the remedies arising on them become changed in the process, unless adequate safeguards be used. Equitable rights accruing under deeds acquire a legal force when included in the written law. Canons of interpretation, by which covenants and grants, or matters in the nature of grants, are to be construed against the covenantor and grantor, and in favour of the covenantee and grantee, must give way before the rules, available to the parties in common, for the right reading of statutes. On a breach of duty imposed by the Legislature, any one damaged has his action; he need not be a contracting party. In the case of companies' clauses, a remedy by mandamus springs up. The infraction of a public Act may involve a prosecution for misdemeanour, while under a deed the proceeding would always be civil.

Influenced apparently by the first of the above distinctions between conveyancing forms enacted for the public good, and the like forms signed, sealed, and delivered inter partes, our correspondent of last week, "H. R. D.," has raised a question of very great importance to the title of a purchaser of a mortgaged or charged property under the Trustees and Mortgagees Act. The tenor of his letter makes it almost unnecessary to say, that the writer belongs to that branch of the profession which is occupied with the law of real property transactions rather than with the business of them. We will presently consider whether his view can be supported. Nevertheless, the effect, which adverse opinions from such a quarter have on the destiny of the new measure, does not depend upon their proving tenable or untenable. Their existence is a testimony to doubt; and doubt on a Real Property Act that is not compulsory is fatal to its adoption. The master eye and hand of a Brodie or a Coulson in preparing work for the Legislature can foresee and guard against danger. In the present instance, what is lacking in the draftsman's prudent wisdom must be made up by critical vigilance on all hands in the legal press.

The point mooted by H. R. D. is raised upon a comparison of the effects of the 11th section of the Act which gives the powers to the person to whom the mortgage money "shall for the time being be payable," and of the ordinary mode of providing that the power of sale may be exercised by any person entitled to give a receipt for the purchase money. As we see some reason to differ from our correspondent, we will give his own language:—

"This mode of defining the person by whom they are to be exercised, is found to work well, because, although the exercise of the powers by persons to whom the money was not properly payable would not be of any effect between persons with notice, yet a purchaser for value without notice would be safe, provided nothing appeared on the deeds to show that the powers had been exercised by, or the mortgage money repaid to, other than the right person. But whenever the mortgagor in a mortgage under this Act shall have the legal estate in him at the time of creating the charge, the 15th and 19th sections [the conveyance and receiver sections] will confer legal powers; and it is by no means clear that this vesting of legal powers in a person defined by a purely equitable test will work equally satisfactorily. * * *

The question remaining for consideration is, whether a purchaser in possession of the legal estate conveyed by the mortgage deed is safe from the consequences of these powers being kept alive by circumstances of which he has no notice. * * *

The person to whom the money was payable previously to the improper payment still satisfies that description, and is therefore still entitled to exercise the legal powers of conveying the property after a sale, and of collecting the rents through a receiver: and as these powers extend to 'all the estate or interest which the person who created the charge had power to dispose of,'

they will take precedence of the legal estate conveyed by the same deed."

Had the Act, following the common form, simply given the power of sale to the person to whom the mortgage money might for the time being be payable, we should agree with H. R. D. Indeed, his objection had not escaped us when proceeding to review these clauses; but it appeared to be met by the controlling qualifications subject to which the statutory powers are given. In the enabling section (the 11th) it is declared that the person shall have the powers of sale, insurance, and appointment of a receiver, "to the same extent (but no more) as if they had been in terms conferred by the person creating the charge." This seemed to us to preserve the equitable character of the powers. Yet the words here used are by no means conclusive to that effect; for how is the word "extent" to be understood? Does it, or does it not, go to the character of the power of sale as well as to the mode of exercising it? Therefore the question, whether the Act confers a new legal power, or supplies the old equitable power, could, if it depended on the 11th section only, scarcely be determined without a judicial decision. But, for the protection of purchasers without any notice that the mortgage money is payable to some other person than the party selling, resort may be had to the 33rd section; which is, in substance, that nothing in the Act shall empower trustees or other persons to affect the estates or rights of any persons soever, except to the extent to which they might have affected the estates or rights of such persons, if the instrument under "which such trustees or other persons are empowered to act" had conferred express powers for such trustees or other persons to affect such estates or rights. Assuming that a mortgage deed can be included under the above description in inverted commas, we have then to consider what would be the effect in a deed of giving power to the person to whom the mortgage money might for the time being be payable, to sell so as to defeat the estate of a purchaser taking under the mortgagee the legal estate without notice that the mortgagee was not then entitled to the mortgage money. We should be of opinion, nil. Such a power would be an absurd and repugnant attempt to counteract a rule of equity. At the same time, it must be admitted that this is but a lame and roundabout way of saving the great principle of the safety of a purchaser without notice, and withal a way not free from the doubt of treating a mortgage as a deed by which a person is "empowered." All that can be said is, the deed empowers the mortgagee to recover his money in some manner or other.

We are forced upon the whole, to the conclusion that, bearing in mind the ambiguity of the word "extent" in the 11th section, the severance in the frame of the Act of the power to convey from the power to sell, and the limited character of the 33d section, as well as the tortuous application of it, it is really impossible to decide whether the power of sale given by the Act be legal or equitable, and, therefore, to pronounce any confident opinion on the point raised by H. R. D. The courts would undoubtedly seize hold of any plank to throw to a purchaser without notice. This is sorry comfort to a draftsman, whose peace of mind depends upon his preserving his client from a suit, as does an Alpine guide's in keeping his traveller from a crevasse.

The necessity of testing the effect of the powers given in the Act by the effect which they would have if given by certain persons, or in certain deeds, indicates a break-down of the principle itself, at least as embodied in this Act, of making powers incident to estates. Practically, such a test amounts to supposing that the particular section giving the power, forms part of the deed in question. Else, in what language are we to imagine the power to be given? Experience may ultimately show, that the safeguards requisite in giving statutory conveyancing powers leave no practical difference between Lord Cranworth's or Mr. Christie's system and Lord Brougham's. In other words, that the only safe way of helping conveyances is by the statutory supply of clauses to them—a result which, in the end, would satisfy the reasonable a priori view that the Legislature had better leave men to make their own contracts in their own way.

LIABILITIES OF SHIPOWNERS.

The legal liabilities of shipowners have of late been the subject of much discussion, both in this country and in the United States. In the summer of 1859, the Chamber of Commerce at Liverpool called the attention of the mercantile world to the question, by the publication of an elaborate report which fully explained the present defective state of the law, and contained some valuable suggestions for its amendment. Since that document was published, a committee of the House of Commons has made careful inquiry into the condition of our merchant shipping, with a view to its relief, and of that enquiry the legal liability of shipowners formed an important branch. The Chamber of Commerce at New York has more recently taken the matter under its consideration, and by late accounts from that quarter we learn that Mr. Lindsay, the member for Sunderland, had gone to Washington, in order, if possible, to induce the American Government to come to some international agreement upon the subject. Of the result of his visit we are not yet fully informed.

By the common law of England the liability of shipowners was unlimited; and this was also the rule of the civil law. But England, like other maritime countries, was eventually induced to abandon a rule which operated as a serious check upon commercial enterprise. In the earliest maritime code of Europe, the Consolato del Mare, we find the principle of limited liability distinctly laid down (chaps. 141 & 182). It is there stated that the responsibility of a part-owner is limited to the value of his share in the ship. In the course of the seventeenth century this principle of limiting the owner's responsibility to the value of the ship was recognized by the law of Holland, of France, and of the Hansatic Towns. But it was not until long afterwards that this rule was adopted in England. The first limitation of the liability of owners was introduced in 1734 (7 Geo. 2, c. 15), but the Act then passed was intended only to protect them in case of the embezzlement of goods on board by the master or crew. In the year 1786 another Act was passed (26 Geo. 3, c. 86) which still further limited the liability of owners in the case of robbery by whosoever committed, and in case of fire. It was not, however, until the year 1813 that the rule which had been so long previously recognised in other commercial countries was introduced into the law of England. By an Act passed in that year (53 Geo. 3, c. 159) the liability of shipowners was practically limited to the extent which has since prevailed. By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, the liability of the owners of sea-going ships is defined, where all or any of the following events happen without the fault or privity of the owners: 1st., in case of loss of life, or personal injury to passengers; 2nd., in case of the loss or damage of goods; 3rd., in case of loss of life, or injury caused to persons on board of other vessels in consequence of improper navigation; and 4th., in case of loss or damage happening to any other vessel, or to any goods on board of any other vessel in consequence of improper navigation. In all such cases the Act in question provides that no owner of any such ship, or share therein, is answerable in damages to an extent beyond the value of his ship and the freight due, or to grow due, in respect of such ship during the voyage, which, at the time of the happening of any such events as aforesaid, is in prosecution or contracted for subject to the following proviso, (that is to say), that in no case where any such liability as aforesaid is incurred in respect of loss of life or personal injury to any passenger shall the value of any such ship, and the freight thereof be taken to be less than fifteen pounds per registered ton. (See s. 503.)

In case of loss of life or personal injury, it is in the discretion of the Board of Trade within the United Kingdom, upon giving three days' notice to the owners to refer to the decision of a jury the following question, namely, the number, names, and descriptions of all persons killed or injured by reason of any wrongful act, neglect, or default, for which the owners are responsible. The Board may enter into a compromise as to the damages, but if it does not do so, then such damages in the case of each death or injury so occasioned, are to be assessed at thirty pounds, and the gross amount so assessed is the first charge upon the value of the ship and freight. It has been decided that the value of the ship is the price for which she would have sold, not at the commencement of the voyage, but immediately before the occurrence of the accident. It has also been decided that the freight available for the payment of damages is that which was due at the same time. It is not competent for any person in case of such loss of life or personal injury, to institute proceedings against the owners of the ship until the inquiry commenced by the Board of Trade is completed, or unless the Board decline to institute such inquiry. Subject to the right of the Board of Trade to recover damages in cases of death and personal injury, the owners may, in order to secure the due distribution of the fund, pay into a court of equity the value of the ship and of the freight at the time of the accident; but in this case, the costs of the suit in equity, as well as the costs of any proceedings taken against the owners at law, or in the Court of Admiralty, must be paid by them.

In addition to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, conferring on the Board of Trade the powers of which we have given a summary, in the case of accidents involving loss of life or personal injury, that statute contains a section (511), to the effect that if any person is dissatisfied with the statutory amount of damages, he is at liberty to bring his action against the shipowner on his own account, provided "that any damages recoverable by such person shall be payable only out of the residue, if any, of the aggregate amount for which the owner is liable." It appears that this section has caused much annoyance as well as loss to the shipowners. Its practical effect is stated to be in the Report of the Parliamentary Committee lately published, "that when an accident occurs, innumerable actions at law are instituted against opulent companies or wealthy shipowners, and under the threats and pressure of legal proceedings, the owners of the incriminated ship are, unless where all the claims arise within one jurisdiction, glad to pay almost any amount of compensation money rather than bring the cause before a court of law." And this state of things is attended with inconvenience to the public as well as to the shipowners; for the Committee add that many of the latter, and those of the wealthiest description, refuse to take passengers on board their vessels on account of the unknown liabilities to which they may be exposed in the event of loss of life. This result we may assume was never contemplated by the Legislature. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act were obviously intended to carry out the principle which had been previously recognised that in no case should the liability of the shipowner exceed the value of the ship. Even the objectionable section, the 511th, is explicit upon this point. But if in its practical results it is found to be hurtful alike to the shipowner and the public, we trust that some means may be found of correcting the evil without impairing the salutary powers which are now invested in the Board of Trade with reference to casualties that occur at sea.

But the liabilities of British shipowners are not confined to this country. They may, in the absence of an international arrangement to the contrary, incur indefinite liabilities in foreign countries. Foreign shipowners may in like manner incur an unknown amount of liability in this country; for it has been expressly decided that the 504th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which limits the liability of British shipowners, does not apply to the owners of foreign vessels. The question arose as follows: a collision took place off the coast of Ireland between two American vessels, one of which, with her cargo, was wholly lost. The other vessel having put back to Liverpool, whence she had sailed, for repairs, she was placed under arrest by an Admiralty warrant, to answer a claim of £8,000 on behalf of the consignees of a part of the cargo of the lost ship. The agents of the incriminated ship having given bail for the amount so claimed, she proceeded on her voyage, and returned to Liverpool in the course of a few months, when a second claim was made under an Admiralty warrant for £1,800, being for another portion of the cargo of the lost vessel. The owners disputed this second claim, but before any final decision was given in the matter, a third claim was made by other parties for £23,000. The owners considering that the amount of the two first claims was fully equivalent to the value of the ship and her freight at the time of the collision, then appealed to the Court of Chancery under the 514th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, in order to have the ship valued, and their liability limited, in terms of the Act. But it was decided by Vice-Chancellor Wood that that limitation of liability does not apply to foreign vessels, and the decision was affirmed on appeal to the Lords Justices. Our remarks upon this important case we must reserve for a future number.

ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

On a recent occasion we adverted to the law of protection and discharge from arrest, with the view of pointing out the inconvenience and uncertainty which it introduces into the relation of debtor and creditor. Such mitigations, however, of the power of arrest and imprisonment for debt are found absolutely necessary, in order to reconcile the continuance of such an institution with the feelings of modern civilization, notwithstanding the prestige of centuries of usage in its favour; and modifications of this kind have now so extensively encroached upon the original plain and absolute right of the creditor, that the exercise of it is reduced to very narrow limits. Under these circumstances, it would seem to be a greater innovation in principle than in practical effect to abolish arrest in execution for debt altogether. The suggestion is not novel, but is appropriately and even unavoidably recalled to mind at the present time, when the whole law of debtor and creditor is about to undergo a complete reconsideration. Such a change would undoubtedly be a step gained in the simplification of this branch of the law; it would at once obviate all the antagonistic provisions for discharge and protection, and would remove a multitude of embarrassments in practice. It seems, therefore, only necessary to show that it is equally in accordance with principles of reason and justice—in order to insure the speedy consummation of so desirable an object. What, then, are the grounds on which the present law is maintained, and does any valid reason exist for preserving an institution which is so strongly opposed to the current of modern legislation and modern feeling?

The law of final process against the person of a debtor derives its origin from the times in which human beings were enumerated, like cattle, amongst the subjects of property. The Romans, the great inventors of laws for all the nations of the world ancient and modern which dwell within the pale of civilization, fully recognized the practical applicability of this utilitarian view of humanity to the realization of debts. In the earliest period of their law they laid down the maxim, Qui non habet in ære, luat in corpore, and applied it strictly in its literal meaning. Payment in person with them did not consist in a temporary detention of the debtor in prison, but, so far as the person could be converted into payment, was a stern and literal fact. The body of the debtor was judicially assigned to the creditor in absolute dominion, to be dealt with as freely as any other article of property; the creditor might slay his debtor and dispose of his body to the best advantage, or might sell him alive in the nearest slave market; and where there were several creditors, it is said they might make a piecemeal distribution of the body of the debtor between them.

Amongst this practical people the taking of the debtor in execution had thus a real meaning and a substantial efficacy in payment of the debt. This seems to be all that could be said for it, but was alone sufficient to recommend it to a people whose strictly logical conclusions of law were never tempered by any milder considerations. The more humane influences of modern times, in rejecting the notion that human beings may be dealt with as property, have deprived the institution of the only object which it was designed directly to effect. The taking in execution in the present enlightened age consists merely in depriving the debtor of his liberty, which does not directly contribute in any way towards payment of the debt; and thus the remnant of the institution which has descended to our times retains no perceptible trace of its original meaning, nor does it seem capable of explanation on any rational ground.

One indirect effect, indeed, imprisonment sometimes carries with it, which is not at all within the intention and object of the institution; and, moreover, is as unjust and iniquitous as it is unintended. While the imprisonment fails in securing any payment out of the real debtor, it is frequently successful in extracting payment from others who are not indebted at all. When the real debtor is cast into prison and thereby threatened with ruin in his credit and business, his friends and relations are naturally induced to interpose, if possible, to save him, and supply the money to redeem his liberty. Such a result is highly acceptable to disappointed creditors, who, having miscalculated the sources of credit on which they trusted, can by this means avail themselves of other resources which they never bargained for. It is a result looked for and anticipated by unscrupulous and extortionate money lenders, who regard the debt as a draft upon the kindly and humane feelings of the monied friends of the debtor. The law which thus exacts payment of the debt from those who do not owe it is not only illogical and irrational, but works at times the greatest hardship. Persons wholly innocent of the debt, who neither insured nor guaranteed it, who received no advantage from it and to whom no credit was given, are placed by the law under a constraint to pay; and the best feelings of humanity are made the instruments and means of extortion. In the natural course of things an insolvent falls back upon his friends and relations for his own future support; but by this contrivance they are burdened with the additional weight of his antecedent debts. The fruits which the imprisonment of his debtor thus bears to the creditor are the only efficacious end which it serves, and therefore supply the only motive, apart from mere vindictiveness, for putting the law in execution. Extortion from the friends of the debtor being the only efficacious end of the law, must also be treated as the only ground for maintaining it; and indeed this is sometimes seriously advanced as the great argument in its favour. Upon every consideration of common fairness and humanity, it is the one argument which, beyond all others, most imperatively calls for its immediate repeal.

Arrest and imprisonment for debt may be wholly disregarded in connection with our commercial system. It forms no element in the basis of commercial credit. To large trading companies it is altogether inapplicable; and private traders and trading partnerships are protected from its effects by the law of bankruptcy. The field of its operation is confined to the small pecuniary transactions of private life, where it still retains a wide scope for oppression and hardship. It exercises little or no influence in honest and fair transactions; but is a vital ingredient in the lowest order of money dealings. The abolition of arrest and imprisonment would at the same time put an end to some of the most disgraceful transactions to which the practice of the law is made subservient.

The existence of a similar law throughout most countries of Europe is sometimes asserted as an argument of its practical utility. A practice so universally prevalent must, it is thought, be supported on the grounds of an equally extensive necessity or expediency. The law of imprisonment for debt, it is true, prevails in all the principal countries of Europe, and also in most of the United States of America. But is not the argument drawn from this wide extension of the law altogether fallacious? The law is widely spread only inasmuch as the countries in which it prevails have drawn their laws from a common source, and have imitated the same example. The laws of Europe, in the matter of personal obligations and procedure, have been framed for the most part on the basis of the Roman law; America transplanted her law already formed from England. So far as the law possesses a real efficacy in producing payment, either from the assets of the debtor or from his friends, there may be perceived a substantial ground for maintaining the law common to all countries. In former days, the general insufficiency of the laws of bankruptcy and insolvency to secure the estate of an insolvent gave considerable scope for its operation; but modern contrivances of law have been devised sufficient to extract all the assets of the debtor, without resorting to this process of duress; and the extortion of money from other parties who are not legally involved in the same liability is, as we have pointed out above, a crying and cruel injustice. Moreover, we believe we are fully justified in asserting that the most enlightened jurists are by no means satisfied with the state of the law in their respective countries, and many opinions of eminent men might be cited in favour of the total abolition of imprisonment for debt.

The policy of maintaining this law can scarcely now be deemed an open question. It was submitted to the inquiry of the Common Law Commissioners of 1832, and fully investigated by them in all its bearings. It will be well to recall to notice the conclusion to which, with one dissentient — Mr. Serjeant Stephen — they arrived.

"The principle of the present law is, to do justice by the use of the strong and compulsory means of arrest and imprisonment applied indiscriminately. The system has been found to be productive of so much hardship and injustice, that it was at last deemed to be necessary to mitigate its consequences by the enactment of the insolvent law. The joint operation of the two opposite processes, for the imprisonment and enlargement of debtors, has been productive of so much evil as to lead to the suspicion, which seems to be fully verified by inquiry, that the mischief ought to be obviated, not by provisions designed for the mere mitigation of its consequences, but by removing its cause; that is, by limiting the power of imprisonment itself, and confining it to cases where it is warranted on the plain and just principle of preventing the debtor from fraudulently absconding or removing his property beyond the reach of justice, or for the punishment of actual fraud, or compelling the debtor after judgment either to pay the debt, or make a cession of the whole of his property for the benefit of his creditors." "Beyond this, we believe that the practice of imprisonment for debt is neither warranted in principle, nor beneficial in practice, and that, on the contrary, whilst the exercise of the present almost unlimited power is productive of pecuniary loss, injury, and distress to creditors as well as debtors, it also occasions great moral evils in its tendency to subdue that proper degree of pride and honest feeling which is inconsistent with the degradation of imprisonment in a gaol, and to level the distinction between guilt and misfortune."

It may be observed with respect to the two purposes for which the Commissioners would preserve imprisonment for debt; namely, to correct fraudulent and obstructive conduct on the part of the debtor, and to compel a complete cession of his property for the payment of his creditors, they both seem to be more adequately and suitably provided for in other ways. The former strictly comes within the province of penal law. Imprisonment in such cases is of the nature of a punishment for misdemeanour, and should be applied by the authorities, and with the procedure appropriate for criminal law, and not for the private purposes, or at the caprice of the creditor. The latter purpose, the cession of property, it will be remembered, at the time of the inquiry by the Commissioners, could be fully effected only by the voluntary act of the debtor himself. The creditor could not have execution against copyhold lands, or more than half of freehold lands, or against stock in the funds or bonds, bills of exchange, or other securities, or any debts owing to the debtor. The imprisonment then operated as a mode of compulsion to extort from the debtor a discovery and cession to the creditor of the property, which the law refused to give him by a more direct process. It was a mere measure of justice to the creditor so long as this property was withheld from his reach, to give him some resource or hold over the debtor for obtaining it. The process of duress by imprisonment, however, was very inefficient, since debtors might decline to purchase liberty at the expense of their property and means of subsistence; and many preferred spending their property in prison, where they could purchase every luxury, even occasional liberty included, to going out empty into the world. This purpose of imprisonment is, at the present day, entirely superseded by the modern alterations in the law which render all the property of the debtor, of whatever kind, equally amenable to the process of the judgment creditor. We are fully justified, therefore, in considering that the limited purposes for which the commissioners advised the retention of imprisonment are, or may be, more adequately and appropriately secured by other means, and that their opinion may be interpreted at the present day as a recommendation of a total and unqualified abolition of arrest and imprisonment for debt.

We might further enlarge on the numerous minor arguments against imprisonment for debt, such as the useless expense to both parties, the waste of resources by the imprisoned debtor, the indirect evils it produces, the unproductive cost to the country, and the like; but all these have been so often enforced, and are so clearly recognised, that it is sufficient here merely to refer to them; our object now being rather to call attention to the present state of the question, and the necessity for a speedy solution. The time has at length arrived when a decisive step must be taken. The legal relations of debtor and creditor are to be subjected by the Legislature to a thorough re-construction, with a view to a complete and permanent settlement; and the question cannot be avoided, whether our insolvency law shall henceforth be restricted to the direct objects of its existence, namely, the cession, realization, and distribution of all the property of the insolvent, or shall continue to be complicated, encumbered and confused with elaborate proceedings and contrivances for evading the direct and primary consequences of the law of final process against the person?

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before Vice Chancellor STUART.)

Dec. 4.—Draper v. The Manchester and Sheffield Railway Company.—In this case orders had been obtained for production of documents by the defendants to the plaintiff, his solicitor or agent. The plaintiff's solicitor, in company with a public accountant, attended at the office of the defendants' solicitors for the purpose of inspecting the documents. The defendants' solicitors, however, refused to permit inspection by the accountant; and the plaintiff now moved that such inspection by the accountant might be ordered. It was contended on the part of the defendants that a professional accountant could only be employed under an order made upon a special application.

The VICE CHANCELLOR said that the question was whether under the order that the solicitor or agent should be at liberty to inspect documents, a professional accountant would be at liberty to attend as agent. In his opinion, there was no rule of the Court which precluded a litigant who had obtained the ordinary order for production of documents from having the benefit of the assistance of an accountant. He thought, therefore, no objection could be made against an accountant as agent.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Nov. 22.—In re —, an attorney.—The facts of this case are stated ante, p. 4. An application was now made that the rule to shew cause obtained at the commencement of the term to strike the attorney off the rolls, should be made absolute on the ground that the attorney had written a letter to the applicants stating that he did not intend to shew cause against the rule.

The Court made the rule absolute.

SESSIONS HOUSE, CLERKENWELL.

At a meeting of the magistrates of the county of Middlesex held on the 29th ult. it was decided by a large majority, that all sittings of the court for criminal and county business should in future be held at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell-green.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

Thursday, Nov. 6.—The Sheriff's Court.—Mr. Deputy Fry, Chairman of the Officers and Clerks Committee, presented a report from that body, recommending certain alterations in the fees taken at the Sheriff's Court, and an application for an order in council extending to the court the Bills of Exchange Act. He added that the proposed application had been suggested by Mr. Kerr, the judge of the court, with a view to assimilate the jurisdiction and mode of procedure to those of the metropolitan county courts.

The report was at once agreed to.

Central Criminal Court.—Deputy Fry presented a report from the Officers and Clerks Committee, recommending the entire abolition of the fees received for admission to the galleries of the Central Criminal Court, and suggesting certain regulations for the admission of the public in future. The report stated that the gross receipts taken for admission to the galleries in question during six years amounted to 911*l.* odd, and the attendant expenses to 269*l.*, leaving 642*l.* It had been the immemorial custom to apportion the net profits amongst the Lord Mayor for the time being, the sheriffs, and the swordbearer—the share of each amounting on an average to about 35*l.* a-year. The Court expressed its approval of the abolition of the fees in question. Some discussion ensued with regard to the admission of the public in future, but substantially the report was adopted.

The Court then adjourned.

During the sitting of the Court of Exchequer last week and while the jury had retired for a few minutes for refreshment, a coat belonging to one of the jurors was stolen from the jury box, and a very shabby one left in its stead. Exchanges of hats, coats and umbrellas are of common occurrence in our courts of law; and having regard to the circumstance that the things left behind are invariably of a very inferior description to those taken away, it is extremely doubtful that these exchanges are the result of accident.

EQUITY.

JOINT STOCK COMPANY—ACTS ULTRA VIRES—AMALGAMATION—RATIFICATION.

Re the Era Assurance Company; Williams's Case, V. C. W., 9 W. R., 67.

Two very important questions arose and were decided in this case. It was decided in the first place that where the deed of settlement of a joint stock company does not contain any provision enabling the company to effect an amalgamation with another company, such amalgamation cannot be accomplished so as to transfer the liabilities of the company attempted to be amalgamated; and in the second place it was held that although there had been a special general meeting which approved of an agreement for amalgamation, yet that was insufficient to confer the power which was wanting in the deed, so as to affect the shareholders with the liabilities of the amalgamated company.

The present case is the first in which it has ever been definitively decided that a company, without power in its deed to do so, cannot accept a transfer of the business and liabilities of another. In the Sea, Fire, &c., Society v. Port of London, &c., Society (Ho. of Lds., 6 W. R., 24), this question was raised; but the case being decided upon another point, it was not necessary there to decide the question. Lord Cranworth, however, in delivering his opinion, expressed himself to the effect that such a transaction was one in which "no company would be justified in engaging, because it certainly cannot be said to be within the ordinary scope of any company to purchase the goodwill of another company."

The second question which was mooted before Wood, V.C., is one perhaps of greater difficulty than the first. His Honour is reported to have said that "when an act is once established to be ultra vires, no meetings of shareholders, however numerous, can bind any one dissenting shareholder." This, however, is to be taken in connection with the context which would appear to limit the rule to acts opposed to the constitution of the company, and which it could not legally perform in any manner; for he says, "It was never intended to be laid down that a company formed for one purpose could bind the shareholders to acts not within the purpose of the deed." This limitation of the rule brings it well within the reported decisions applicable to the question; but it leaves open the particular question involved in this case, namely, whether the acceptance of the transfer of the business of another company of the like nature, subject to certain liabilities, is or is not an act within the purpose of the deed constituting the company for the purpose of procuring such business.

As to confirmation by the shareholders, his Honour observed that "no case of laches which could be imputed to the general body of shareholders had been made out; they might in cases of insanity and the like be de facto ignorant, while de jure they were only bound to know that to which they were held by their deed." A similar question arose in the Sea, Fire, &c. Society v. The Port of London, &c. Society—namely, as to the effect of the former society taking the business and receiving the premiums of the latter—upon which Lord Wensleydale observed, that "it is more than questionable whether the company is liable for the receipts; for the mass of shareholders have this protection—that they can be liable only through the act of their directors, acting under the authority of the deed and the Act of Parliament. It is a captivating argument for a jury, and they are very often misled by it in these cases of joint stock companies, and likely to produce injustice, that the company have had the benefit of the plaintiff's goods, or service, or money; whereas for the purposes of contract, the company exists only in the directors and officers acting by and according to the deed; and by the statute law the company is no more liable than a corporation by charter for the act of one or more of its members, who are distinct persons by law."

COMMON LAW.

POOR LAW—PAUPER LUNATICS, REMOVAL OF.

Strand Union, Respondent, v. St. Giles-in-the-Fields, Appellant, 9 W. R., Q. B., 52.

For the litigation in this case, the framers of the Act 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, seem to be chiefly responsible; as they neglected to insert some words essential to the clearness of its meaning. The first section of that Act repealed a clause on the same subject, viz., the status of a pauper's family with respect to the cost of their maintenance and their place of settlement, which was contained in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66; and while substituting an amended enactment, did not proceed to incorporate the new provision into the former Act, by providing that the two should be read together. Such being the course of legislation with regard to paupers generally, there came a still more recent Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 97) which dealt with the costs of maintaining a pauper lunatic, and directed him to be maintained out of the common fund of the union, provided that when sent to the asylum he was exempt from removal to his parish "by reason of some provision in the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66." Now the only provision which could so exempt him was that one which was repealed by 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 111; and therefore it was argued on behalf of the union to which the lunatic in question had been sent to be maintained, that he did not come within the terms of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97 at all. The Court, however, said that the intention of the Legislature must have been that the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 should be read in all respects as if the provision substituted for the first section by the subsequent Act, had been originally inserted in the former Act; and that the lunatic therefore was exempt by reason of a provision in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66 within the meaning of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97; and that the costs of maintaining him did, therefore, fall on the common fund of the union. Information as to the manner in which the two first of the above statutes bears upon the status of irremovability in another point of view, namely, with regard to the inheritable quality of such status will be found in the case of *Reg. v. Elvet (7 W. R., Q. B. 586; 29 L. J., M. C. 17).

MAGISTRATES—LIABILITY OF—ALLEGATION OF MALICE.

Somerville v. Mirehouse, 9 W. R., Q. B., 53.

The all-important question, with reference to his own interests, for a justice of the peace to determine, who is called upon to make an order, is, whether the matter with which he is about to deal is one which is, or is not, within his jurisdiction as a justice, for if it be, then (provided he is acting without malice) he is absolutely safe by virtue of the clause recently passed for his protection in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 1. This provision declares that in any action brought against a justice in respect of a matter within his jurisdiction as a justice, the declaration shall allege that the act was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause. And that if such allegation be not proved at the trial, the justice is to have a verdict. The present case shows that the omission of such an allegation also makes the declaration demurrable—a fact which enables the justice to put an end to the proceedings as soon as he is served with the declaration, and without waiting for the trial. But though this seems the only point decided in the present instance, the case affords a useful opportunity to suggest that in a matter within a justice's jurisdiction, and in respect of which he has acted without malice, he will be protected, although the defendant should be in a position to allege in the declaration that the justice had acted without reasonable and probable cause, provided the ingredient of malice was wanting.

It is also observable that a magistrate when acting, as he sometimes does, in a purely ministerial, and not in a judicial capacity (see per Lord Denman, Linford v. Fitzroy, 13 Q. B. 245), he is responsible for the legality of his acts, even though no malice can be shown; for, in such cases, the matter does not come within his jurisdiction as a justice. And further, it should be carefully borne in mind that the question of jurisdiction or no jurisdiction is sometimes a matter of nicety; and that the law requires justices to know the extent of their jurisdiction. As to what class of cases are within a justice's jurisdiction, the following recent cases may be consulted (among others) with advantage—viz., Barton v. Simpson (20 L. J., M. C. 1); Ratt v. Parkinson (ib. C. P. 168); and Newbould v. Colman (6 Exch. 189).

HIGHWAY ACT—INDICTMENT FOR NON-REPAIR.—5 & 6 WILL 4, c. 50, ss. 94, 95.

Ex parte Bennett, 9 W. R., Q. B., 54.

This case supplies an important qualification to the rule laid down by the Court in Reg. v. Arnould and Others (8 Ell. & Bl. 550). That was a decision under the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) the 94th section of which is to the following effect: "that if any highway shall appear to be, on the sworn information of any witness, out of repair, then the person chargeable with its repair is to be summoned to attend at a special sessions whereat the justices (either on the report of a competent person or on their own view) may inflict a penalty, and order the repair to be made." And by the 95th section, if at such special sessions the liability to repair is denied by the party charged, the justices are to direct an indictment at the next assizes or quarter sessions to try the question. Now the case of The Queen v. Arnold decided that, under such circumstances, the magistrates have no discretion; but are bound to order an indictment. The Court remarked that it would perhaps be better that the magistrates should be able to make such order dependent upon the fact of there being any person chargeable with the repairs in question; but that the words of the Act were too strong to admit of this construction.

Acting upon this decision, the applicant in the present case applied for a rule requiring certain justices to order an indictment to be prepared in respect of the non repair of a certain road; but it appeared that the road in question had been already determined by the verdict of a jury not to be a "highway" at all, and consequently not to be within the Highway Act at all. The Court held that in such a case, viz., where a road out of repair was denied to be a highway, the duty thrown by the Act on the justices does not arise; and the application was consequently refused. Hence the rule is, that where a road is out of repair, and a person charged with liability to repair the same refuses or neglects to do so, the justices, on being satisfied that there is no question with regard to the road being a highway, are bound to order an indictment to be prepared.

PARLIAMENTARY DRAFTING.

As the diminution in size of our future statute books will depend much upon the withdrawal of all bounties upon verbose legislation, and the remuneration of the bill drawers upon some system which experience has recommended, it appears to be an obvious expedient, that bills should emanate from the different departments of the Government, or its subordinate machinery in the first instance, and then be subjected to ulterior review. New enactments would thus be likely to meet the recognised defects, and to be free from unnecessary ordinances; while the ulterior revision is calculated to lop off the excrescences of too special views. The Board of Trade in 1853, and the Customs in 1854, had their bills of those years prepared in their respective departments, which bills have since, as I am informed, continued unaltered. This is a strong proof, that to render laws practical, not only the suggestion of their principles, but the form of their legislative declaration, or diction, should emanate from the departments of Government. All the departments, probably, have on their legal staff a sufficient amount of legal and natural discernment to originate few measures or clauses that will fall under the scythe of an ulterior revision.

M. N.

WHAT WE MAY NOT DO WITH OUR OWN.

The most general application of the foregoing maxim is, perhaps, the denial to the citizen of a right to disobey the laws, although they are our own, or even to misstate them; such being contra bonos mores, to pass without severe censure. Yet, Mr. Bright, in his recent speech at Birmingham, and the Times of the 6th inst., re-echoing the voice of Mr. Bright with a hoarse murmur of denial, yet accepting the truth of his statement of legal facts, say, first, that "there is no such thing in England as the law of primogeniture," and, next, that "the laws of entail are not as they used to be." Lest the readers of the Journal should suppose, that our laws have been by a silent revolution metamorphosed into the contrary of their ancient, and indeed recent state, an express denial of both these statements is here ventured to be offered, with a regret that our eminent opponents consider, that law reform has already done such wonders, as their statements imply. As practice follows the law, primogeniture exists not only in law, but also in cases where the owner of the soil has made a will, that is, in fact, so that, in both cases alike, the eldest son receives the bulk of the freehold property. This the Times admits; which extenuates the error of its legal judgment. The laws of entail are also precisely as they were settled by the Statute De Donis, and Faltarum's case. Land can be tied up now, so as to be unsaleable in fee, for precisely the same time that it could have been removed from the market and the laws of political economy in the reign of Edward IV., viz., for a life or lives in being twenty-one years, and nine months, the last period being a late judicial donation. The fiction of common recoveries, suggested by Faltarum's case, and in effect then decided, as an adequate barring of an entail and a restoration of the entailed land to the uses of commerce, has doubtless been abandoned for the simpler process of the enrolment of the deed barring the entail. The enrolment, however, is as unnecessary and inexpedient a device, in point of principle, though indispensable in the present state of the law, as the ancient systems of recoveries, fines, and warranties. The Act for the abolition of these strongholds of technicality did not abrogate or alter the law of entails, nor even the principle on which the barring of entails was accomplished. This principle appears to have been, and is, that tenants in tail might, if they choose, become tenants in fee, but should not do so, without a little trouble, unnecessary as it appears in any view, except as a homage to the majesty of the law, and a proof of obedience to her dictates, even when troublesome, or apparently anile. Mr. Bright, and the Times, therefore, are premature in anticipating as a fait accompli what, at the present rate of legal progress, is likely only to happen, if ever, a century from the present date.

ZENO.

HINTS TO THE PROFESSION.

These are days of professional struggle; and to no profession more so than that of a solicitor. When our difficulties arise from the ordinary incidents of fair competition, none can complain; but when to these are added the unfair inroads on profits already diminished,—of men not so weighted for the encounter as we are—of men who are not subjected equally to taxation, and of whom the same educational acquirements are not expected—there need be little apology to any one, still less to the Solicitors' Journal for calling attention to the present state of the profession, and attempting to suggest a remedy for it.

Many of our difficulties are matter of notoriety. Estate agents, land surveyors, accountants, debt collectors, and trade protection societies, all dishonestly divert from us fair profits and earnings. They actively injure us in two ways. In one, by undertaking to do what is really attorneys and solicitors work; in another by continually representing to the public, the danger of going to lawyers, who will to a certainty, as their interest is, lead their clients into lawsuits. Agents are common everywhere, who draw agreements, even leases, assignments, call their employers "clients," and in a score of ways, act as and charge as solicitors; but are put to little expense for education, or professional training, and are not liable to certificate duty, or taxation of their bills. This is all trite information. But it proves, and our complaining admits it, that these pseudo lawyers have in great part beaten us real ones in competition for the public favour. How have they done this? To the minds of many who have thought over these things, the reason seems to be, that agents profess to charge a fixed per centage for their remuneration on all sums passing through their hands. This is doubtless a profitable and handsome recompense. Still the mode of estimating it recommends itself to the employer. He thinks he is prepared for, and knows the worst the matter can cost him. He has not to wait anxious months before he gets the hated bill of costs, which item by item disgusts him by its reminder of annoyances and reverses he would gladly forget. What is our remedy? Upon this I merely write to evoke opinions, and so obtain the best suggestions. I venture to think, that though at one time it may have been thought so, it would not now be derogatory to the profession to require for its remuneration in the collection of debts, rents, and all other matters presenting a money standard of calculation, a per centage on the amount. Scriveners were, and are expressly by custom and law allowed to do so, and what solicitor will deny he is a scrivener? Perhaps, too, it might be made practicable and customary to consult a solicitor at a single interview, and then and there pay his fee. An announcement of such modes of doing business as I have indicated (if sanctioned by leading members of the profession) would rally many a wavering client to his old adviser. Besides, if there is one thing more in arrear than another with a solicitor, it is the making out of bills. Either he must employ at great expense persons qualified, or himself labour to draw up his charges in fitting phraseology and consistency of time and fact. All of us know it to be a laborious business. This would be got rid of almost entirely, with its concomitants of taxation, by the change advocated. I do, then, beseech the attention of all our professional brethren to the consideration of this matter. Of the higher, because it deeply concerns the lower, of the lower because it is becoming to them a question of mere existence.

A SOLICITOR.

THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS (23 & 24 VICT. CAP. 38.)

In your article of the week before last, you very ably illustrate the relations of the old and new law as to notice and no notice to purchasers and creditors, and how they are variously affected thereby, and the inharmonious and inconsistent legislation thereon. In your remarks on the recent enactment, you say that there is nothing to prevent a creditor re-registering his execution every three months; I would suggest that if there is nothing to prevent it, the Act contains no provision for re-registering, and appears to me intended to deprive a creditor of any remedy against a purchaser after three months, unless the writ of execution is put in force.

You think, that unless the creditor could re-register the execution, he would forego his claim altogether, you mean, of course, against purchasers; there is nothing to prevent a creditor at any time after such three months from enforcing his claim against the estate of his debtor; after three months, a purchaser would not be bound unless the execution was enforced before the execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase money. A purchaser would be bound to satisfy an elect tenant, although more than three months had elapsed since the registration of the execution. Several questions arise in considering the probable operation of the Act as regards enforcing executions.

1st. A creditor puts a writ of execution in the hands of the sheriff, who returns—nil:

Qy? Is this putting the writ in force in compliance with the requirements of the Act, if so, is the new law satisfied, and would the judgment have the full effect and force of the previous law, as though the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, had no existence, and a purchaser be affected by the registered judgment, although the execution may not have been registered within three months before the completion of the purchase?

2nd. The sheriff not finding sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt out of the real and personal property of the defendant:

Qy? Would the judgment remain a charge for the balance on the real estate of the defendant, either possessed at the time or after acquired?

3rd. If a writ of execution is issued in one county, would it affect a purchaser of property situated in another county?

4th. Is a writ of elect only intended by the Act? As leasehold property can be extended under a feri facias, would not a purchaser of leaseholds be affected by the registration of such a writ? and would the issuing and registering of a feri facias affect a purchaser of freeholds, as the writ is not defined by the Act?

Some light thrown upon the above queries would greatly assist in the understanding of the Act, and help to determine the position in which judgment creditors and purchasers stand to each other.

Had it been the intention of the Legislature to limit the time in which a creditor should enforce his judgment against the lands of his debtor in the hands of a purchaser, might it not have been provided that a purchaser should not be affected by a judgment after five years (or such a period as might be reasonable to enable a creditor to procure satisfaction of his judgment); this would prevent the difficulty of compelling a creditor to enforce his execution forthwith, which will frequently press hard upon the debtor.

It is well known that in the majority of cases where the creditor is unable to procure satisfaction of his judgment, he registers it on the chance of what it may bring him without having any exact knowledge of his debtor having any real property, and by so doing often obtains satisfaction of his claim. That a creditor should be so helped is reasonable enough, and we should be careful to prevent any collusion between fraudulent debtors and purchasers whereby a creditor might be evaded. You observe, "Why should not judgment creditors be protected as purchasers by those who profess to have the interests of purchasers in view?" and seem to think that an assimilation to the Irish Judgment Acts would be an improvement; and it appears this could be effected by making the register notice to all, which would place the law of judgments on a more uniform and positive footing. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, provides that notwithstanding a purchaser having notice of a judgment, he shall not be affected thereby until such judgment is registered; this seems intended to remedy difficulties about notice; but to render the enactment more perfect, the converse should have been enacted, that when so registered, it should be notice to all, and have protected the creditor as well as the purchaser. It is the general practice for purchasers to make these searches, and it is not unreasonable to surmise that when they are omitted it may be that the purchaser purposely endeavours to prevent notice being proved against him, although it is a dangerous proceeding, since slight circumstances may fix him with constructive notice.

In relation to incumbrances on land, could not mortgages be registered in the name of the mortgagor, and in a simple and inexpensive way, similar to judgments (probably the payment of a shilling registering-fee would pay the expenses of keeping a register)? Such register would greatly help to prevent a variety of litigation amongst mortgagees without notice.

It would save expense and complexity if a purchaser was bound by a judgment if registered in the Common Pleas, although not registered in the local registers (Middlesex, &c.) At present a creditor to charge property in a registering county has to register in the local office, for which purpose a memorial is required verified by an affidavit, and the memorial and affidavit must be stamped, the memorial must also be certified to by a master of the court in which the judgment has been entered up, a costly affair, and unnecessary if the simple memorandum as is the practice in the Common Pleas is sufficient. In addition to the local registering the creditor should also comply with the later act and register his judgment also in the Common Pleas; and if he wishes to take advantage of the best security he can obtain, he would of course do so, to get a charge on any property his debtor may have in an unregistering county. And now by the new Act he must in all cases register his execution in the Common Pleas. This threefold registering is not either of any benefit to a purchaser, who has to search twenty years in the local office, and if he finds a judgment there, the particulars necessary to identify the defendant not being registered, he is compelled to make troublesome and sometimes unsatisfactory inquiries. A prudent purchaser would also search the Common Pleas register it being doubtful whether a purchaser with notice would not be bound by a judgment registered there, although not registered in the local office, and would avoid being so placed that notice might be proved against him. It would be an improvement were the necessity for this double registering and searching prevented. Also if the expense of enforcing a writ of elect were lessened, these matters should have some consideration in future legislation. Complications of this nature are quite sufficient to render inoperative and burdensome laws, that if carried out by a more simple machinery and certain action would be equitable and beneficial.

I have thrown off these remarks somewhat loosely, but with a view to provoke some further public discussion on the subject, and help to make another change, should one take place, more satisfactory and so far as possible final. Q.

RIGHT OF TRUSTEES TO BE RECOUPED IN RESPECT OF BREACH OF TRUST.

In the proposed suit by one of the family against the trustees and the husband, the Court would perhaps direct that any property taken by the husband under the settlement should be liable to make good the breach of trust (see Clive v. Carew, 7 W. R., 433); property taken by the wife to her separate use was held liable for the value of a pearl necklace improperly sold by her; but the Court would give no relief to the trustees against the husband for the breach of trust committed by the trustees. The remedy of the trustees against the husband would be at common law by an action to recover back the money lent. C.

BAR ETIQUETTE.

I am much obliged by your insertion of my letter on "Bar Etiquette" in your journal of the 3rd ultimo. By a somewhat curious coincidence, Mr. Shaen's paper on that subject was also printed in the same number. From it we gather, that the Oxford Circuit is not the only one on which the suitors are flocked avowedly and openly, for the sake of giving guineas to young gentlemen whose only title to them consists in the bare fact that they are junior counsel, and have done nothing whatever to deserve them.

Mr. Shaen informs us, that he sometime ago, being concerned for a client, "and the case being a perfectly simple one, prepared only a single brief." Now mark the sequel,

"Conticuere omnes, intentique ora tenebant."

Or, to express the same idea less classically,—

"Silence! hush! shouts the crier, His Lordship is ready. Now Jurymen, enter the box, and sit steady."

Scarcely had the orator retained by Mr. Shaen commenced his speech, when a buzz of, "Where's your junior?" arose amongst his hungry compeers, who pressed their claim so pertinaciously, that at length the brief-holder explained that Mr. Shaen must really "Give him an assistant labourer, as he (the counsel) was not allowed by the etiquette of the Bar to open the pleadings to the jury." Mr. Shaen's objections to this absurd extortion were urged as vehemently and as ineffectually as my own had been, but he at length succumbed, having in fact no choice left him. Still Mr. S. in one respect was less unfortunate than I had been, since I, even to this day, am ignorant whether my "guinea fee and tail brief," did or did not eventually become the spoil of the junior counsel who, par excellence, had done the least—if to do less than nothing at all be possible—to merit them; while on the other hand, in Mr. Shaen's case, "the Bar, by rapid self-examination, succeeded in ascertaining who was the Junior," and that point settled, the Benjamin of the circuit, blushing, hesitating, and recalcitrant, was "pushed up to the side" of the gentleman who had been originally retained, and thus conveniently located, the two gownsmen—

"Both pleading of one cause, both in one key,
Droned o'er the brief, due but to one of them,
As if their hands, their sides, voices, and minds
Had been incorporate."—

"Awkward enough I grant, but surely not oppressive," cries the uninitiated reader; "who save themselves were prejudiced by this droll exhibition?" Alas! "one brief, two fees," is it should seem, de rigueur; for this "bar etiquette," continues Mr. Shaen, "increased the amount of costs by some few pounds without the slightest corresponding advantage to the client."

But, for this last remark, which tells indeed an over true tale, these exhibitions would have been ridiculous, but nothing more, since if the judge did not consider them disgraceful, Mr. Shaen and I—involuntary actors in them—had no occasion to beg his lordship's pardon "for making of his court contemptible." The whole system of "tail briefs," and needless fees is, however, based on wrong, since courts are constituted to redress the grievances of suitors, and not to swell the money bags of counsel.

Mr. Shaen proceeds in his very valuable paper to dilate on certain other points of etiquette, observed with more or less exactness amongst the bar; but these, however frivolous he and I may think them, affect the long robe inter seipsos only, the public being uninjured, and the attorneys having nothing at all to do with them. At first sight, indeed, those minutiae of circuit regulation, which forbid a barrister to dine or walk during the assizes with an attorney, or to dance at an assize ball with an attorney's daughter, seem supercilious; but the real fact is unquestionably, that these rules are barriers planned not to guard the counsel from the intrusion of attorneys, but to save these latter from being torn to pieces by the rival assiduity of contending would-be-brief-holders. Some few practitioners may indeed be ruffled at what they call the hauteur of the long robe.

"Alas! the Big-wig's gratitude Hath rather set me mourning."

As a rule, the barrister who rises by servility will, when position is obtained, be overbearing. No doubt. Yet this, so long as we have briefs for scarce one-twentieth of the expectants, may be indeed a grievance; but we can remedy it, or it will cure itself—and, after all, it is but "turn and turn about."

"Folks change their manners as their fortunes change."

Gil Blas loved passionately a lively little actress attached to the royal company of comedians at Madrid, but who had originally been a soubrette. "Now, prythee, Laura!" cried Signior de Santillane, "why all these airs? For what do you take yourself; and why so uppish always in the afternoon?"—"I split the differences of my daily occupations," replied Laura; "I am, I own, a waiting-maid every morning for our prima donna; but then o' nights, I am alternately a Queen, an Empress, and a Vestal Virgin, or even, now-and-then, a Goddess; thus, on the average, my dear Gil Blas, I am, at least in my own estimation—let me see—a Marchioness, and as a Marchioness I will, when I wear my silk gown, be treated."

The rule forbidding circuiters to enter an assize town before the afternoon of the Commission-day, though it may be, and doubtless is, at times an inconvenient one; seems, however, to be based upon the principle of "Let us all start fair!" and is, unquestionably, of very ancient date. Roger North informs us, that when his brother Frank (afterwards Lord Keeper Guildford) rode the Norfolk circuit, the whole bar got drunk at Colchester, and Frank, especially, so very tipsy, that he insisted, in spite of argument and remonstrance, on riding full drive into a horsepond. Here, his brethren acting on the principle of "The devil take the hindmost," left him, and scuttled away in the hope of anticipating a stray brief or two, while North's clerk—"at that time, fortunately, sober"—extricated his master, and with no small difficulty brought him round again. The first use which Frank North made of his recovered senses was to gaze around and cry out anxiously, "Where are they?" and that fact ascertained, to clamber awkwardly upon his nag, and gallop off after his briefs, fees, and learned brethren.

WARWICK.—An action was lately tried before Mr. F. Dinsdale, the judge of the county court, Warwick, which was brought against the London and North Western Railway Company by a dealer in china for damage done to certain goods while in their custody. It appeared that the goods were brought to Warwick by the London and North Western Railway Company, but that they had in the first place been consigned to the North Staffordshire Railway Company. The former company relying upon previous decisions resisted the claim on the ground of the consignment not being to them but to the latter company, with whom, alone, they contended, rested the responsibility of fulfilling the contract. Mr. Dinsdale, however, decided that since the damage had clearly been occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the London and North Western Company the latter were liable for the damage. He accordingly directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff, leaving the two companies to settle the question of contract between themselves.

LEGAL EDUCATION—NEW RULES.

The education of attorneys and solicitors has at length met with some attention on the part of that dignified body the Benchers of the King's Inns; and several new rules have been promulgated, and are subjoined. It should be explained that the admission of solicitors in Ireland is regulated by ancient usage, by the benchers, and whether this was an encroachment, as some allege or not, it would be hopeless to attempt to wrest this jurisdiction from the hands which have so long held it. The control of the benchers over the solicitors' branch of the profession has already been fully described in this journal. [S. J. Dec. 17, 1859, p. 102.]

The only rule of the new code that seems peculiarly open to objection is that requiring that the new professor of law shall be a barrister of some years' standing. There is no reason in the world why a solicitor, if otherwise possessed of the requisite fitness for teaching articulated clerks, should be excluded by the terms of the rule. We are surprised that the Lord Chancellor, Lord Justice, and other eminent persons forming the committee of benchers from whom these rules emanated, should have assented to so ungracious and unnecessary a restriction.

RULES.

"1. That from and after the 1st of January, 1861, no person seeking to be bound apprentice to an attorney or solicitor, shall be required, in his petition for that purpose to be addressed to the benchers, to make any statement with respect to his education or literary qualifications; nor shall he, or any person on his behalf, be obliged to make affidavit in respect to the matters aforesaid.

"2. That from and after the 1st of January, 1861, every person who shall seek to become the apprentice of an attorney or solicitor, shall, previous to the making of the order of permission to become bound, pass an examination in the following course of instruction, that is to say;—

Latin—Caesar's Commentaries, first book; Sallust; Virgil first three books of the Aeneid.

History—Liddell's Roman History; Smith's History of Greece; Abridgment of Hume's History of England.

Arithmetic—Galbraith and Haughton's Treatise; or The Theory and Practice of Arithmetic, as used in the national schools.

Book-keeping—The treatise used in the national schools.

Geography—Sullivan's Geography Generalized.

English Composition, and Writing from Dictation; in which penmanship and orthography will be taken into consideration.

"3. That such preliminary examination shall be held at the King's Inns' lecture-room in the week next previous to each term, before the Legal Education Committee, the Moral Examiners of the three law courts, and the president and vice-president of the Incorporated Society of Attornies and Solicitors of Ireland, who shall be specially summoned to attend; and it shall be conducted by a fellow or scholar of Trinity College, or some other competent person, for that purpose to be selected by the Legal Education Committee. All petitions and memorials shall be presented at least seven days before the commencement of the term.

"4. That the names of the several persons who shall have passed the said examination, shall be posted in the hall of the four courts, in the Solicitors' Buildings, and on the door of the lecture-room at the King's Inns.

"5. That, for the improvement of the legal education of persons seeking to be admitted attornies or solicitors, there be instituted a professorship of law, specially adapted to the wants of that branch of the legal profession.

"6. That such professorship shall, from time to time, be filled by some member of the Irish bar, of not less than six years' standing, to be elected by the benchers; and that he shall hold office for three years.

"7. That the salary of such professor be £100 per annum; and that his duties be such as shall, from time to time, be prescribed by the Legal Education Committee.

"8. That, with a view to create a fund for liquidation of the expenses occasioned by the foregoing arrangements, the fee of £3 3s. shall, in addition to all other fees, be paid to the treasurer of the King's Inns by each person hereafter seeking to become bound apprentice to an attorney or solicitor.

"9. That it be recommended to the judges of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, to make rules or regulations in their respective courts, to the effect that, after the last day of Michaelmas term, 1860, no sum of money shall be payable by any person seeking to be admitted an attorney, as a fee to or for the benefit of the Moral Examiners of either of the three law courts, appointed pursuant to the 13th & 14th Geo. 3, c. 23; but that the fees which would otherwise be payable to the Moral Examiners by persons already bound, shall be paid to the treasurer of the King's Inns.

"10. That an examination in law (including the practice of the courts, and the general duties of an attorney and solicitor) shall be held in the week next previous to each term; at which the apprentices who shall have then actually completed the period of their apprenticeship, or who shall be within six calendar months of such completion, may present themselves.

"11. That such examination in law shall be conducted by the aforesaid professor, and some one of the Moral Examiners to be selected for the purpose by the Legal Education Committee, in presence of the benchers, the Moral Examiners, president, and vice-president, as aforesaid, all of whom shall be specially summoned to attend.

"12. That no person hereafter to be apprenticed shall be admitted an attorney or solicitor who shall not have passed the foregoing examination in law, unless by special order of some one of the superior courts of law or equity.

"13. That prizes upon a scale hereafter to be determined, and also certificates of merit, may be awarded by the Legal Education Committee, to such persons as shall have distinguished themselves at the examination in law, and whose morals and qualifications for the profession shall have been approved by the Moral Examiners.

"14. That the names of the several persons who have passed the said examination in law, arranged in alphabetical order, shall be posted in the hall of the four courts, in the Solicitors Buildings, and on the door of the lecture-room at the King's Inns; and that upon the list of persons so to be posted there shall be notified the prize or other distinction of merit to which any of such persons may have become entitled."

COMMON PLEAS—MISS AYLWARD'S CASE.

All readers of newspapers are by this time aware that Miss Aylward, a Roman Catholic lady of respectability, has been committed by the Court of Queen's Bench for contempt in giving insufficient replies to certain interrogatories put to her on the subject of the part she took in the abduction of some children. The children have not as yet been recovered, and as Miss Aylward's replies were unsatisfactory, she was sentenced by the Lord Chief Justice, the other members of the court concurring, to be imprisoned for six months in Richmond Penitentiary. This happens to be a criminal prison used for male offenders only, the judges, as also the other persons in court, having been, it seems, unaware of the fact that female offenders are incarcerated in a different building. To the latter place, however, Miss Aylward was speedily transferred.

Her next proceeding was to apply to the full Court of Common Pleas for a habeas corpus, on divers grounds. An array of counsel appeared, and argued for her that her commitment was illegal by reason of the mistake made in the place of imprisonment. The case of Lieutenant Allen—released last week from Millbank—was cited as proving that the place of punishment named in the sentence is material, and cannot be altered or varied from. It was also contended that "contempt" is a civil and not a criminal offence, and that a person committed for contempt ought to be lodged in the Marshalsea or debtors' prison, and not in a gaol or criminal prison. The arguments having concluded—

MONAHAN, C. J., remitted the prisoner to her place of confinement, the Court unanimously holding that the Court of Queen's Bench had full power to imprison in any place it judged best; and that its decision could not be reversed by another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

Right Hon. A. Brewster, Sir C. O'Loughlen, Q.C., J. O'Hagan, and Devitt, with Mr. Mooney, attorney, appeared for the prisoner, and McDonogh, Q.C., and Brereton, Q.C., with Mr. John Martin, attorney, for the prosecution.

TALK OF THE FOUR COURTS.

"It is stated that several gentlemen are to be called within the bar immediately; among them are Messrs. Charles Shaw, R. A. Exham, W. Sidney, and R. H. Owen. The Evening Mail gives some further "information," which can only be regarded as a playful hint, that her Majesty's counsel are already far too numerous. This authority states that when the new batch of silks is created, "the Lord Chancellor will at the same time, in compliance with a requisition numerously and respectfully signed, call several of her Majesty's counsel back to their old estate at the outer bar!"

The Lord Chancellor's list of causes has already been gone through, and the Master's lists are also very light, consequently there is much complaining of the state of business, on the part of those practitioners who confine themselves to the equity courts.

Reviews.

A Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions; comprising a summary account of the whole proceedings in a suit at law. Being the sixth edition of Mr. Serjeant Stephen's work under that title, with alterations adapting it to the present system. By JAMES STEPHEN and FRANCIS F. PINDER, Barristers-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons.

No edition of Mr. Serjeant Stephen's treatise on pleading in civil actions has been published since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. The very numerous decisions upon that statute, and the radical changes introduced by it into the system of common law proceedings, made it a difficult task to adapt by means of notes or slight alterations of the text the new system of pleading to a work intended to be a compendious account of the old, which was in many respects so different. The editors, therefore, while preserving entire large portions of the original work, have throughout made considerable alterations and additions, and hold themselves responsible for the whole; although the work is published as a new edition of the well-known treatise of Serjeant Stephen. The general plan of the editors, however, is very similar to that of the original author. There is, first, a summary account of the proceedings in an action from the commencement to its termination. Then comes a chapter on the principal rules of pleading—each rule being treated separately in distinct sections, and illustrated by reference to authorities, for the purpose of throwing light either upon the principles involved, or upon points of practice where they are concerned. The present treatise is admirably suited for students of the law who desire to have a clear conception of the principles of the existing rules of pleading; and the style in which it is written is so pleasant as to make it really an agreeable book for any one to read—what can rarely be said of any law book.

The Magisterial Synopsis; a Practical Guide for Magistrates, their Clerks, Attornies, and Constables, in all matters out of Quarter Sessions; Summary Convictions and Indictable Offences, with their Penalties, Punishments, Procedure, &c., being tabularly arranged. By GEORGE C. OKE, Assistant Clerk to the Lord Mayor of London. Seventh Edition enlarged and improved. London: Butterworths.

Mr. Oke has long been appreciated by the profession as a writer, peculiarly well versed in magisterial law. His "Magisterial Synopsis," the work through which he first became so widely known, has been throughout the length and breadth of the country what it professes to be—a practical guide for magistrates, their clerks, attorneys, and constables in all matters out of quarter sessions. It will be seen that the work has already reached a seventh edition, the last edition having been got through very rapidly. In a work of this kind, and one, moreover, which has already received the best marks and tokens of the approbation of those for whom it was composed, it would be impertinent for us to affect any detailed criticism upon its merits. We need only say that the new edition is in excess of the previous one in point of bulk, to the extent of about one hundred and twenty pages, in which there is not an unnecessary word; Mr. Oke everywhere exhibiting his anxiety to compress the subject matter into the smallest allowable compass. The present edition, moreover, contains several new titles which are rendered important by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, enabling the opinion of a superior court to be obtained in many new cases. Mr. Oke, in his last preface, remarking upon the startling proportion which statutes relating to the duties of the magistracy bear to the whole number of those enacted, observes "that the public general statutes on magisterial law which are added each year form on an average one quarter of the number of those passed. During the last session, as to which so much has been said and written, 42 of the 154 Acts passed related more or less to the duties of justices of the peace. In 1858, there were 26 out of 110; and in 1859, there were 32 out of 101." It is fortunate, therefore, that the demand for such books as the "Magisterial Synopsis" creates so quick a sale, as it is obvious that every two or three years the law relating to the jurisdiction of justices of the peace must require complete revision. The most useful feature in Mr. Oke's Synopsis, and what, no doubt, has made it a universal book of reference for magistrates throughout the country, is his original and convenient plan of arranging offences both summary and indictable in a tabular form, exhibiting at a glance the penalties, punishments, and procedure, with extremely intelligible references to the statute law, and to judicial decisions. Mr. Oke's tables of the criminal law are models of precision and ingenious arrangement.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

JUSTICE AND ITS MISCARRIAGES, WITH OBSERVATIONS UPON THE NECESSITY OF APPOINTING A MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

Mr. JOHN TURNER read the following paper at the Newcastle Meeting of this Association:—

There is nothing of more importance in all civilized countries than the pure and perfect administration of justice. It is in reliance on the protection which the law is presumed to give to every subject that the natural liberty to avenge personal wrongs and to redress injuries is abandoned, and the more rational appeal to lawfully constituted authority is resorted to. The protection of person and property by the law is the link which binds the subject in allegiance to the sovereign, and compels a willing submission to the payment of heavy and burdensome taxes to the State. If, therefore, justice is so indifferently administered that no one can rely upon it for protection—if it is so uncertain that it becomes a question whether it is not better to submit to wrong—rather than aggravate the evil by an appeal to tribunals upon whose decisions no certainty of justice can be expected, then, indeed, the primary object of all government is defeated; and whatever country is so situated, is reduced to a condition inferior to those less civilized states, whose laws give assured protection, without the "glorious uncertainty," which, to some extent, is the reproach of our system of jurisprudence. It is impossible to overrate the importance of this subject to professional men. Our living depends upon the confidence our clients place in courts of justice to redress their wrongs; and to the growing feeling of distrust in the sufficiency of existing tribunals may not unfairly be attributed some portion of the falling off in the practice of professional men which has of late years become so painfully manifest. It is desirable, therefore, that a calm investigation of our own judicial systems should be made, to see whether they fulfil the reasonable expectations of the suitor and the public. It would have given me great satisfaction had some person of more ability, and greater influence, brought this important subject under your consideration; but in the hope that other gentlemen will give the matter the benefit of their experience, I will endeavour to place before the meeting those circumstances which appear to me to show, that while other departments of science are pursued with success and benefit to mankind, that of law and justice holds but a doubtful position. It would appear that our lawgivers have been very sensible that the administration of justice is far from perfect—at least, this may be inferred from the great number of new laws, new systems of procedure, and endless changes which are constantly taking place; and if there were any prospect of amendment from such perpetually recurring alterations, neither the profession nor the public would have reason to complain of them. There must be something essentially wrong, which is not generally understood to call for so much change. If we appeal to positive law in the statute books, we certainly find imperfections, but not to an extent to account for the great distrust of law exhibited by suitors and the public;—and as the Common Law professes to have a remedy for every wrong it is not to that department of jurisprudence we must look for the evils which have created such distrust. We have our systems multiform and complex—our equity jurisprudence and its procedure—our common law courts and their procedure—our code of bankruptcy and insolvent law—our county court law, and, not the least important, our criminal jurisdiction. From each system complaints arise of imperfect justice, or rather of injustice, and the charge is the more mischievous from its generality. That vague term, "The Law," is always accused of being the real delinquent, the administrators of justice never being suspected of having any hand in the matter, and as a consequence changes of form and of procedure have been the chief object of law reformers. With the changes of procedure, however, there has been no abatement of complaints, and whether the fears of suitors are well grounded or not, it is certain that a vast number of persons avoid to the uttermost an appeal to courts of justice to redress their wrongs, and submit to what they deem to be injustice, rather than trust the result to an appeal to legal tribunals. What is the cause of this standing aloof? We have courts of appeal to correct the errors of judgment in inferior tribunals, and our judges are reputed to be the wisest, the most learned, and the most upright in the world. What, then, are those evils, which are so painfully felt that not only the great mass of the public abstain from resorting to courts of justice, but attorneys and solicitors are constantly under the necessity of advising their clients to submit to wrong, rather than risk the greater evil of litigation? What are those evils which are so avoided? If the course of procedure is unexceptionable, and the judges above suspicion, what is there to avoid? I speak not only for myself, but I believe also the mind of the profession, when I answer these questions by saying, It is the great uncertainty which may attend the result of litigation,—the doubt that what appears a plain and simple case may never be understood, and that common sense, justice, and reason, may be set aside when the day of trial arrives. It is because I think that this impression upon the mind of suitors may be overcome that I have ventured to bring the subject before you for discussion. Our respect for the judicial office acts as a restraint upon anything like free discussion respecting the merits or demerits of particular judges; and it equally restrains us from referring to any of their decisions in a manner which can render them the subject of comment by others. That great and distinguished men do now adorn the bench as in times past no one can dispute, but that the greatest and wisest sometimes make mistakes is a fact known to every lawyer. Lord Brougham, in giving the judgment of the House of Lords in Cottle's case in August, 1850, attributes the errors of the judges as the result of erring human nature. "No judge," said his lordship, "ought to be ashamed after erring to acknowledge his errors, still less has a court any reason for so misplaced a shame—so unseemly a reluctance to admit that the dispensers of justice are subject to the common lot of erring humanity." Admitting that no man is perfect, it is manifest there is a wide difference between the natural imperfection of man, and that species of conduct over which men have control. Every wrong committed may be attributed to the failings of "erring humanity," and to accept the imperfections of human nature as a reason for errors would absolve from all human responsibility. It is not, therefore, to the mere imperfection of human nature that the miscarriages of justice can be attributed. If the fact were so, the evil would be without remedy. I mean no disrespect to anyone when I say that the judges of England are like other men, with the same infirmities, and liable to the same influences. They, of all men in England, are the only persons whose position is irresponsible; and it is greatly to the credit of the judges that with so little control, justice should have been administered without any other complaint than that of uncertainty, and what a distinguished lawyer and statesman terms the common lot of erring humanity. That they are practically irresponsible is manifest from the laws which regulate the office of judge. Until the reign of King William and Queen Mary, the judges were appointed during the pleasure of the Crown, and were liable to be removed at the discretion of the Crown, on the advice of the Privy Council. After the death of Queen Mary it became necessary to provide for the succession of the Crown, in the event of there being no issue of the Princess Anne of Denmark. King William, in a speech delivered in Parliament, invited the consideration of his faithful commons to the subject, and a Bill was brought in founded on resolutions agreed to by that body. As the Bill afterwards passed (12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 3), it contained in the third clause, not only regulations relating to the succession of the Crown, but also the following provision:—"That after the said limitation shall take effect as aforesaid, judges' commissions be made quandiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established; but upon the address of both Houses of Parliament it may be lawful to remove them." This provision, which was to take effect after the death of the Princess Anne of Denmark without issue, was introduced into the Act without any record for the reasons which called for it; and it is probable that King William, whose speech has no reference to judges whatever, was not aware of the extraordinary limitation of prerogative which the Act entailed upon succeeding sovereigns of England. Those persons who defend this provision do so on the alleged grounds that it rendered the judges independent of the Crown, and is the foundation of liberty and the palladium of justice; for judges are no longer subject to any improper influence of the Crown. I do not myself see the force of such reasoning—some of the greatest lawyers that ever lived held their commissions from the Crown during pleasure, and it is a gratuitous assumption to suppose that the Crown, the ministers of the Crown, and the Privy Council, would attempt to poison the source of justice by improperly influencing a judge in the performance of his duties. The reasoning also implies the existence of judges of a most depraved and corrupt nature, for only such would permit themselves to be so influenced. The influence of the Crown, if exercised, would be equally potent, and quite as effective with such men, whether they held their commissions during pleasure, or during good behaviour. The judges represent the person and Majesty of the Queen in the exercise of her highest and most sacred duties. The Queen is the supreme civil magistrate and the representative of justice, and the judges exercise her authority by commission. Looking to their high and dignified position, it is fitting that they should be independent of external influences; but it was suspecting justice in its highest position to place the representative above the power of the Sovereign. I can see no reason for the alteration which was made in the ancient law of England, by the statute to which I have referred; but having been made, I see no reason for altering it. It is remarkable, however, that the sixty-five county court judges do not hold their office by any such secure tenure; for by the 18th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, they may be removed by the Lord Chancellor for inability or misbehaviour. If regard be had to the fact that in the House of Commons there are one hundred and fifteen honourable members learned in the law, it will be seen how utterly improbable it is that an address would ever be agreed to for the removal of a judge. The discussion would be endless, and a sufficient difference of opinion would be displayed to secure immunity. The irresponsible nature of a judge's office is therefore manifest.

There is an influence which naturally flows from this state of things which exerts an evil effect upon the country. It renders the bar of England less independent; for the prospect of promotion must be looked for through the portals of the House of Commons; for the political party who may have the ascendancy in that body have the bestowal of vacant judgeships. Members of the bar, therefore, naturally aspire to the honour of becoming legislators, and attach themselves to one or other of such political parties; and in proportion as they become humble followers of any party, they cease to be independent gentlemen. One evil consequence of this system is, that a thick-and-thin political partisan, however unqualified by private character and legal attainments, yet, if a good debater and a useful party man, feels certain of promotion, and that his chances of success are greater than other members of the bar who, however worthy and eminent in their profession, are liable to be passed over. Our observation teaches us that if this be not always the rule, the exceptions are few. I am aware that many well-meaning persons defend such system as essential to the working of our constitution. No minister, say they, can expect support unless he rewards his supporters, and the lawyers are the ready debaters in the House of Commons, and the most useful supporters of a government. I deny that there is any such necessity in a minister as this argument implies; the minister who has to purchase support, by the very act betrays the honour of his country, and proves that his position is spurious. That the support of the members of the bar is courted, is manifest from the course of modern legislation, and its practical tendency to favour such body as a class. Attorneys who formerly held the office of judge in the courts for recovery of small debts, and who also held the office of under-sheriffs, and as such executed writs of inquiry, and writs of trial, are now put aside as judges for the exclusive service of members of the bar. The judges of the superior courts are entrusted with the appointment of taxing masters, and were doubtless appointed to perform such duty of selection from their position and learning, in the belief that they were the most competent to select the best qualified persons. In the discharge of this great public trust they do not consider it improper or derogatory to their position to treat such appointments as private patronage, and to nominate barristers to such offices without regard to their want of special training for the office, a proceeding which is about as rational as the appointment of a physician would be as house surgeon in a public hospital. The solicitor to the Treasury, and the solicitors to the public departments, are mostly selected from barristers. And as they are not qualified to act as attorneys in courts of justice, the country has to pay for agents for transacting the legal business of the State, in addition to the official's salary. An undue stimulus is thus given to follow the profession of a barrister, and this circumstance will in some measure account for the fact that of late years, while the number of attorneys has remained stationary, the number of barristers has more than doubled. It is not under such circumstances surprising, that many enter the profession who are disappointed in their expectations; and if we consider the great public benefit of having a body of highly educated and honourable men as advocates, the evils of stimulating increased numbers, whereby half are disappointed, will be readily appreciated. It is a fortunate circumstance for the country that most of our great lawyers are too much occupied in their profession to become the daily supporters of a political party.

A slight change in the mode of selecting the judges would, without interfering with an independent support to a Ministry, always secure the best men for the office of judge. With a really good man (a sound lawyer, a man of patience, of learning, of good temper, and of an equitable and liberal judgment) the miscarriage of justice would be almost impossible; and it would matter very little whether he held his office during pleasure, or during good behaviour. The present system of appointment, and the constitutional position of the judges, is, to say the least of it, calculated to create carelessness in the discharge of their duties, and a disregard of consequences; and this may possibly be one cause of the miscarriages of justice, of which clients so frequently complain. Another marked cause is the apparent want of time in some of the judges to hear the matters before them. In order to get through the list of causes, we not unfrequently see that the facts are sometimes guessed at; and a decision is given before the real circumstances of the case are ascertained. Nine times out of ten the decisions may be right, but the exception is the evil. With a little more patience, and a little more time, there would be no exception to complain of. I do not think it is the duty of judges to compete with each other in the dispatch of business. Diligence, patience, urbanity, and a conscientious discharge of their duty, is all that can reasonably be expected of them; and if the exigencies of the suitors create more business than a judge can physically get through, it is the duty of the State to provide assistance, and not for the judge to become hasty in the discharge of his duties.

Mr. Joseph Brown, with great ability, has exposed defects in our common law system of trial by jury, which renders it unnecessary for me to do more than refer to imperfections in this portion of our judicial system. There is no more potent agent in warping the judgment of mankind than prejudice. Juries are frequently under such influence, and, unconscious of its existence, they frequently allow it to sway their opinions, and give decisions which more unbiassed men would avoid. The alteration made by the Common Law Procedure Act in the formation of special juries, is, in my opinion, calculated to increase this evil. Under the old system, a man suspected of a "bias" was put aside by one of the attorneys, and the gross list of 48 jurors was made up of sound men. The present system excludes the judgment of professional men in the selection of special jurors, and procures only a better class of common jurymen, at a greater expense. I think that men of the greatest intelligence should be summoned on juries, and that they should form part of the court, and feel that their position is one of honour, and the judge should be jointly responsible with them for the verdict. In courts of equity the judge decides, and no prudent thinking person will in such courts ever exchange the judgment of an intelligent judge for that which, under existing procedure, may be the judgment of a prejudiced jury.

From this brief sketch of our judicial system it will be seen that there are many combining causes which contribute to make up the great uncertainty in the administration of justice, so dreaded by clients. To remove these evils, I think that the appointment of a minister of justice is a necessity. There is no really responsible head of the law. The Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, and the Attorney-General in the House of Commons, overburdened as they are with onerous duties, are poor and most inefficient substitutes for a high public officer who should be specially charged with the supervision of law and justice.

But very recently the Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell, declared in the House of Commons that the compensation of £20,000 a-year, proposed to be given by the Bankruptcy Bill, introduced into Parliament during the last session, was the penalty the country would pay for past illjudged alterations in the law. I believe that this sum represents a very small proportion of the actual cost of misguided legal legislation. Some idea of the mischief arising from being misled by eager law reformers, may be obtained from the recent statistical returns of Mr. Rodgrave, who, in a manner not to be mistaken, has confirmed the learned Attorney-General's statement as to the penalties paid by the nation for rash changes, termed "reforms." In truth such measures have been more injurious to the profession than to the public, for the latter have only suffered from the increased uncertainty of justice, consequent upon frequent changes, while professional men have lost their living. If we compare the return of the number of writs issued in the superior courts in the year 1859, with that of the previous year 1858, there appears to be a falling off sixteen and a half per cent. in the suits commenced. If there existed returns of the number of writs issued before the passing of the County Courts' Act, the full extent of the evil of modern changes to professional men could be made apparent. Mr. Rodgrave's returns show that the total number of writs of summons issued in 1859, was only 86,277, being an average of 8 writs to one-half of the existing practising attorneys, and 9 writs to the other or more fortunate half, the profit on which would about pay the amount of their certificate duty. Of such number of suits commenced, the great mass were settled or arranged in the first stage of proceedings, only 2,029 being carried on and entered for trial, and of this latter number only 965 were actually tried, or about 2 per cent. of the number of actions commenced. This shows as a result that there are 5 attorneys to every cause set down for hearing, and 11 attorneys to every cause actually tried, or that on an average once in five years, every attorney has the good fortune to have a cause set down to be tried, and once in eleven years every attorney has a cause tried.

The total amount recovered in the actions tried was £153,265. The salaries of the 15 judges and Crown officer charged upon the Consolidated Fund is £85,602, which gives an average cost of £89 15s. 4d. for every cause tried, exclusive of fees levied by officers of the Court, and carried to the fee fund account. If the expense of the Court be contrasted with the amount recovered, it gives as a result 11s. 2d. in the pound as the cost, or 55 and one-sixth per cent. (exclusive of fees).

Before the passing of the County Court Act, the practice in the common law courts was the chief means of support to professional men. We have seen, and still see around us, great firms broken up, and professional men of long standing, after a life time of industry fall to decay. Mr. Rodgrave's returns show the cause of this change so far as relates to the courts of common law.

The existing county court system is the offspring of the reform mania, and some instructive facts are to be gathered from the statistical returns respecting them to which I have referred.

The patronage created and placed at the disposal of the State by this measure was the most considerable which has arisen from modern reforms. The cost of these courts for the year 1859 appears, from the financial accounts and civil service estimates, to be as follows:—

65 Judges' salaries, charged on the Consolidated Fund	£ 76,800
Treasurers	18,050
Travelling expenses of judges	15,000
Travelling expenses of treasurers and their clerks	5,000
Allowance for clerks	4,100
Compensation annuities	4,000
Advance from civil contingencies	25,000
Court houses, stationery, &c.	85,000
	£232,950
Salaries of registrars and bailiffs in part paid out of fees of court	288,392
Making a total of	£521,342

The tax paid by the country appears to be upwards of a quarter of a million sterling, and rather less than a quarter of a million is levied upon the suitors in the shape of fees.

Mr. Rodgrave's return at page 132 gives the total number of plaints entered as 714,562, of which number 41,646 appear to be cases which, before the County Court Act passed, would have been sued for in the superior courts. The total amount received through the instrumentality of these courts was £851,732, and the fees levied upon the suitors £215,623. These results show that the total cost of the county court system is 12s. 3½d. in the pound on the amounts recovered, or 60½ per cent., of which sum the suitors contribute in the shape of fees 5s. in the pound, or 25 per cent. It appears also that there were 27,284 warrants of commitment issued, and 9,003 debtors imprisoned. If the cost to the different counties of such prisoners be taken into account and added to the gross costs of the county court system, I am persuaded that the sum total would considerably exceed the amount of judgments recovered. It would, therefore, be a wise economy and a saving to the country for the state to pay all small debts less discount for collection now levied by county court agents, and to abolish the courts.

The great cost to the country of county courts is but the smallest evil arising from this favourite production of reform. In principle the system aims at collecting the mercantile debts of the country by means of officials who have been created to take the place of attorneys. The public suffer from being debarred from the services of educated professional men, there being no option left to them but either to employ an agent and pay his commission, or to take upon themselves the loss of time and trouble consequent upon county court proceedings. Formerly attorneys were resorted to by the public to transact their business and get in their debts, and upon a letter written by the attorney, or upon issuing and service of process, they obtained payment, two per cent. only of the debts, as appears by Mr. Rodgrave's tables, requiring to be tried by a jury. The client was saved time, trouble, and expense by such system, while county courts entail all three upon the suitor. There are also heavy costs beyond the county court allowance, which deter persons from resorting to them, and they prefer losing their debts, and marking them as had in their ledgers, rather than resort to the county court. The superior courts are practically closed for the recovery of small debts, and the services of attorneys are in substance denied by special enactment.

The number of agents who have sprung up in connexion with the county courts to replace the attorney, is a natural consequence of legislative attempts to destroy that branch of the profession. The profession of the law is degraded by the practices of unqualified persons, and the public mind is imbued with distrust. One instance which came under my observation, was that of a person who acted as a county court agent, and represented himself to be a brother of Sir John Romilly, the Master of the Rolls; with such high pretensions, it is not surprising that he found persons ready to engage his services. In the case to which I refer, he had the impudence to make out a bill of costs, and to sue for the amount, but not being an attorney, he found at length that he could not recover, and that the credulity of his dupes was the only hope of payment.

As the county court system is the most lauded, and the writers for the newspaper press never tire of proclaiming its presumed benefits, so the Court of Chancery being least understood, is the most abused, and the procedure of common law and county courts are proposed to be transferred to such court. Mr. Redgrave's returns enable me to test the propriety of the proposed change.

In spite of the abuse heaped upon the equity courts, if we may judge from the result of their proceedings, they are manifestly in favour with the public. Mr. Redgrave's return shows that the number of suits instituted in 1859 was 2,847. The number of causes set down to be heard 2,226, and the number heard 2,083. The property, the subject of such suits, amounted to millions, of which there was paid into court £8,577,896. The total sum levied for fees was £97,984 4s., being 2½d. in the pound, or about £1 per cent. upon the amount recovered. If there be added to the £97,984 4s. the equity judges salaries and those of their secretaries amounting to £39,850 it gives as a result 3½d. in the pound or £1 5s. per cent. to pay all the expenses of the court, including the heavy compensations granted on the abolition of the Six Clerks' Office. The total amount of taxed costs of solicitors, which include the court fees paid, counsel's fees, stationery, &c., was £794,456, being 1s. 10d. in the pound on the monies paid into court, or about £9 per cent. as the whole cost of litigation.

If we contrast these figures with those shown by the county court system and its cost of £60 and ½ per cent., or with the common law courts and their cost of £55 and one-sixth per cent. exclusive of court fees and professional charges, the strongest reason is shown for keeping the equity system free from the experimental graft of the common law procedure.

In the Court of Chancery, in addition to 2,083 causes heard, there were 2,558 petitions heard, on which 2,500 orders were made, there were also 1,265 special orders on motions, and 5,679 orders at chambers. The total number of causes, petitions, and special motions on which counsel were heard by the judges, and which were decided by them without the assistance of the chief clerks, was 5,906. Every one of these proceedings probably exceeded in magnitude and interest, any jury cause tried, during the same period, and the result shows that, whereas at common law 15 judges were engaged upon the trial of 965 causes, and 3,842 criminal prosecutions, there were 4 equity judges, exclusive of the Courts of Appeal, to hear and decide upon 5,906 causes and special matters of dispute. Assuming that the time of the common law judges is fully occupied with the trial of causes and criminal cases according to the common law practice, the same system introduced into chancery would require eighteen judges as necessary to do the work of the Court instead of four, the present number. In this computation I have treated every criminal prosecution at the assizes as a trial, but we well know that in fact many of such cases must have been disposed of by grand juries, and others by pleas of guilty. I have not found any return of the actual number of criminal trials at the assizes as distinguished from prosecutions. The cost of prosecutions at the assizes was £49,450 7s. 10d.

This cursory view of our tribunals I think warrants my assertion that a minister of justice is necessary to be responsible to the country for all measures affecting the administration of justice introduced into Parliament. But in addition to the many facts to which I have adverted there appears to have been 124,861 persons committed to prison during the same period, of which number 15,120 were county court and superior court commitments for debt, leaving 111,741 persons committed for criminal offences. Here there is surely more than enough to call for a responsible head. Besides the enormous outlay entailed by so much crime, there have been numerous commissions issued by the Crown, which have entailed large outlay and which would have been saved had there been a permanent responsible minister of justice charged with the duty of investigating all proposed defects in law or justice.

If these reasons are not sufficient, let us look around upon our vast colonial empire, whose claims to be considered in the administration of justice cannot be overlooked. An appeal to the Queen in council, with its attendant expence is the only means of redress for the miscarriage of justice in British colonies, and the existence of a minister of justice would render colonial courts more careful in the discharge of their duties, and the necessity for appeals would be less frequent.

It may be that the novelty of my proposal may savour so much of innovation that it may be deemed unadvisable that it should be adopted. I abstain from discussing the details of such an office if it were created, or I might show that beyond creating responsibility in the place of irresponsibility, control and order, where there is now disorder, the change is not formidable. Whether I am correct in my opinion or not, I am well satisfied that something ought to be done to get rid of the distrust which modern legislation has created. When men of fortune, of education and considerable influence, speak ill of justice, as I have heard them do, and complain of its uncertainty and evils, it is time to examine the correctness of such complaints. I think that an undue prejudice has been created against a great and noble profession; and with the control of a responsible minister of justice, if he fairly discharged his duties, such prejudice would soon die away, and altogether disappear. England is still the foremost country in the world; the first in arts, in sciences, and literature, and her system of laws has been the model of surrounding nations. It will be a reproach to us if we do not always retain this proud position, and if there is room for complaint of our judicial systems, I think I have fairly expressed it, and in advocating the appointment of a minister of justice, that I have suggested a suitable remedy.

. Gentlemen are requested to send to Mr. Turner, 9, Carey-street, Lincoln's-inn, such observations as may occur to them on the suggested proposal for the appointment of a minister of justice—also instances of miscarriages of justice which have occurred in their experience, and whether the same have arisen from judicial mistake, from misapprehension of facts, from the mode of procedure in court, technical rule of practice, or otherwise, and if the case is reported, a reference to the report of the case.

Mr. F. N. DEVEY also contributed a paper on Decisions of the House of Lords, as follows:—

The question seems to be whether "the decisions of the House of Lords are binding upon itself"—"and can only be altered by Act of Parliament," as held by the Lord Chancellor Campbell, A. G. v. Dean and Canons of Windsor, 8 W. R., 477, or "are binding"—"upon all Courts except itself," as held by Sir John Romilly, M. R., see p. 478. It is worthy of notice that Lord Kingsdown, p. 485, desired to reserve his opinion as to the observations of the Lord Chancellor with respect to the extent to which the judicial decisions of the House of Lords are binding in subsequent cases. Mr. Jarman (6 Jarm. Conv. 294, ed. 1829), in reference to the case of Humble v. Bill, 2 Vern. 444. makes this remark, "This decree was afterwards reversed, upon an appeal to the House of Lords; but the reversal has always been considered to be unsatisfactory; and the principle upon which the original decree was made is completely established by subsequent decisions." The case of Solarte v. Palmer, 1 Bing. N. C. 194, was considered by Lord Brougham, in concurrence with the unanimous opinion of the judges present, "too clear for an appeal." p. 196. But, in Robson v. Curlew, 3 G. and D. 70, Lord Denman, C. J., says of Solarte v. Palmer, that it "can hardly be now deemed a satisfactory authority." And in Caunt v. Thompson, 7 C. B. 416, referring to Solarte v. Palmer, it is said, "a very strict rule was adopted; but that has not been adhered to." Pollock, C. B., in Paul v. Joel, 6 W. R. 683, speaks of the supposed rule in Solarte v. Palmer, as being regarded by a number of the profession with regret. And Mr. Baron Bramwell, in reference to some well known case decided by the House of Lords, (it is thought to be this case), says: "No Court, of course, could overrule it; but it has given rise to as much litigation as could possibly take place, and the result is that that case has not been overruled, but distinguished from to such an extent, that if any party now cited it he would be laughed at." See 1 Sol. Jour. 775. And Lord Campbell, C. J., in Everard v. Watson, 1 Com. L. R. 425, speaks of the decision in Solarte v. Palmer as "one which has caused much mischief and confusion," and wishes its authority "was got rid of by legislative enactment." In A. G. v. Corporation of London, 2 McN. & G. 269—272, Lord Cottenham states that the House acted on his advice, and there was an error in it. Now, it seems to me that, should the House of Lords in any decision take that celebrated "one step" from the regions of sublimity to those of risibility, their Lordships would better preserve their dignity, and the beneficial operation of the laws, by embracing (as any other Court would) the first opportunity to retrace that step, than by adhering to what Lord

Eldon called consistency in error, and leaving the unfortunate decision to be laughed at and virtually overruled. But, contrary to my first intention, I am entering into argument, and must stop. I feel contented if by this Paper, I should acquire the title of a useful drudge; one who has furnished to abler heads some materials for discussion and for arriving at, perhaps, a satisfactory conclusion.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1862.—The preliminaries of this great undertaking are now settled, the trust is accepted, and direct action will be begun immediately. The following important letter, in which Lord Granville, the Marquis of Chandos, and Messrs. T. Baring, C. Wentworth Dilke, and T. Fairbairn, accepted the trust proposed by the Society of Arts, has been received by that society:—"London, Nov. 22. Sir.—We have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, inclosing the copy of a communication from her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 to the Council of the Society of Arts, in which the Commissioners express their general approval of the object which the society has in view in organizing the Exhibition of 1862, and their willingness to render such support and assistance to the undertaking as may be consistent with their position as a chartered body, and with the powers conferred upon them by their charter of incorporation. Under these circumstances, we have to request that you will intimate to the Council of the Society of Arts our willingness to accept the trust, which the Council and the guarantors have in so flattering a manner expressed a wish to impose on us, on the understanding that the Council will forthwith take measures for giving legal effect to the guarantee, and for obtaining a charter of incorporation satisfactory to us. We have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servants, (signed) Granville, Chandos, Thomas Baring, C. Wentworth Dilke, and Thomas Fairbairn."

UNITED KINGDOM LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 8, WATERLOO PLACE, Pall Mall, LONDON, S.W.

The Hon. FRANCIS SCOTT, CHAIRMAN.

CHARLES BERWICK CURTIS, Esq., DEPUTY CHAIRMAN.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on all policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should, in order to enjoy the same, make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without imparting to the recipients the risk of co-partnership, as is the case in mutual societies.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are put forth as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,987 10	£6,987 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security for the payment of the policy when death arises; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1850, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

Immediate application should be made to the Resident Director, No. 8, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall.

By order,

P. MACINTYRE, Secretary.

CURRENT TOPICS.

In to-day's number we finish the publication of the papers contributed by members of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association for their recent meeting at Newcastle. We shall now do no more than remind our readers of some valuable suggestions contained in these essays. The address of Mr. Kennedy, as President, was mainly devoted to a review of recent legislation as it peculiarly affects the administration and practice of the law. It also, however, touches upon some minor but important questions relating to the usage of the profession, as to which the Association, since its former annual meeting, had passed certain resolutions. In our impression of last week we gave another very elaborate paper by Mr. John Turner, the object of which is to show the great importance to the profession, and the country at large of the institution of a department of justice. Mr. Turner has brought together a striking array of facts and figures in support of his argument, which, upon the whole, is more telling than any which has yet been adduced upon the same topic. Many of his statements supported as they are by the authority of Mr. Redgrave's statistics, are truly startling, and must soon attract the attention of the Legislature. He points out with great force the enormous expense to the country of the county court system, its total cost being considerably over half a million a year, of which more than half is paid out of the public revenue, while the total amount recovered through the instrumentality of these courts is in round numbers not much above three quarters of a million; and as an additional expense the country has to support the 9,000 or 10,000 debtors annually imprisoned by county court judges. Is not Mr. Turner, therefore, justified in the remark that it would "be a wise economy, and a saving to the country for the State to pay all small debts less discount for collection now levied by county court agents and to abolish the courts." As to the evils arising from the general employment of the county court and other "agents," we earnestly commend to the attention of our readers the perusal of Mr. Turner's paper, and a letter on the same subject from "a solicitor" which appeared in the Solicitors' Journal of last week.

Of a different class from any of the foregoing papers is the learned essay of Professor Johnson, of Birmingham, on the Law of Judgments as affecting Real Property, of which we shall say nothing more than that we have received communications from different quarters, to the effect that it would be highly desirable if papers such as those of Mr. Johnson were more frequently contributed by members of our law societies.

Mr. C. A. Smith's paper on the Abolition of Oaths, which has also appeared in these columns, touches upon a subject of a juristical, or perhaps a moral, rather than a legal character. It is one, however, not without interest to lawyers, and in respect of which the public sentiment is daily becoming more favourable to a change.

Mr. Shaen's observations, on the Etiquette of the Bar, raise between the two branches of the profession some delicate but not unimportant questions, which can never be settled satisfactorily to either except by a courteous consideration on the part of both, and which has not been wanting so far as Mr. Shaen is concerned. In considering the subject of bar etiquette it should always be borne in mind that persons who are not members of the bar have no right to take exception to it except so far as it affects their interests or themselves personally. Mr. Shaen accordingly, bearing this distinction in mind, has confined himself in his paper for the most part to the simple question, whether the rule of the bar requiring the employment of two counsel in certain cases is not oppressive upon clients who require the services of one only; and this certainly is a question which may well be discussed by any member of society. Whether the mode of discussion adopted by Mr. Blundell in his letter to, this Journal of last week is the most likely to lead to any useful result is, however, very questionable.

Mr. Devey's memorandum on Decisions of the House of Lords, noting up as it does a number of authorities upon the question whether the ultimate Court of Appeal is bound by its own decision, is a useful contribution upon this moot point.

Mr. Miller's paper, which we publish to-day, contains some useful suggestions for the constitution of country law societies. He agrees with us in recommending not merely preliminary examinations for article clerks, but also periodic ones. While on this subject, we may allude to the important communication concerning the prospects of legal education in Ireland, which we published last week, as to the institution of both preliminary and final examinations for article clerks—the former comprising a curriculum of general subjects of education.

We have thought it right to remind our readers of the useful labours of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and to call attention to the above-mentioned papers, as there is always some danger, on account of the form in which they appear, of their not commanding the attention which inherently they deserve.

Our Irish correspondent, in the communication from him which appears in our columns to-day, calls our attention to a subject which has recently been under the consideration of the Council of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland. The subject is one equally interesting to the profession in this country. It appears that last session there was introduced into Parliament a Bill, to the effect, amongst other things, that the solicitor to the Irish Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be paid a salary; but that, as against other parties dealing with them, he might be entitled to charge costs; for which, however, he was to account with the Board of Commissioners, who, in fact, were in all cases directly, by virtue by the Act, to receive the costs. The Council of the Irish Incorporated Law Society, in their report which has been published, state, as no doubt they are justified in stating, that the "principle involved in such clause was novel, and unless sanctioned by the authority of an Act of Parliament, would be illegal." Fortunately, the Council observed the clause in time to petition for, and obtain, its removal. The profession on this side of the Channel may well share the surprise of their Irish brethren, and participate in the interest which this topic has excited amongst them, not merely on account of its novel character, but because it has been the fashion of late years for our Government to favour Ireland with the first introduction of such novelties—perhaps as experiments in corpore vili—with a view to their importation into this country at some future time.

Those persons who were shocked at the recent dreadful accounts which have appeared in the papers of colliery explosions, will be glad to hear that the Act for the Regulation and Inspection of Mines, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 151, which was passed last session, will come into force on the first day of the new year. The Act contains a code of valuable general rules to be observed in mines, and prescribes the powers and duties of inspectors.*

It is announced that the next meeting of the Law Amendment Society will be held on the 17th instant. A paper will be read by Mr. Edward Webster, entitled, "Observations on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords, 1856, relating to the Expediency of carrying into effect the Sentence of Death before official spectators only, and on a substitute for Capital Punishment." Lord Stanley is to take the chair.

The next meeting of the Juridical Society will be held on Monday, the 17th inst., at 8 o'clock, p.m., when Mr. S. M. Leake will read a paper on "The Taxation of Suitors."

RELATIVE AUTHORITY OF CO-ORDINATE COURTS

In the constitution of a judicature consisting of numerous courts arranged in co-ordinate and sub-ordinate ranks, it becomes essential to the harmonious working of the system to arrive at an exact understanding concerning the relative authority of their respective decisions. The common law remaining altogether in an abstract unwritten form, and statute law, though written, involving innumerable doubts and uncertainties of construction, the judgments of the courts contain the only authoritative declarations of the former, and the only authoritative expositions of the meaning of the latter. It is true, the judgments of the courts are not law in point of form, since they do not emanate from the voice of the Legislature; the function of the Court being jus dicere and not jus dare. But they are law in substance, since they are the authoritative assertion or declaration of what the legislative power has ordained. With respect to the common law, they are an original embodiment in language of its precepts and principles; with respect to the statute law, they either repeat the word of the statute, or, where that speaks with an uncertain voice, they paraphrase in clearer language its real intention; and within the scope of their declaratory powers they form the only criterion by which the public can regulate its opinion of the law. Hence, where the judicial oracles are numerous, it becomes a matter of great importance, in the interests of certainty, to ascertain with what degree of authority each oracle speaks.

It might be expected from this character of the sources of our law that a large field would remain undefined by judicial decision; but it is certainly remarkable that the question before us respecting the relative authority of courts seems still to lie in the regions of uncertainty. It is amongst the subjects left by our law entirely to judicial exposition; and it is one to which judicial deliberation has been very imperfectly applied. For instance, amongst mooted points may still be enumerated the questions: How far a court is bound by the authority of the previous decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction? How far any court is bound by its own previous decision—in the case of an inferior court, and in that of a Court of Appeal? What is the position of a court of ultimate appeal, as the House of Lords, with respect to its own previous decisions? These are questions of which the settlement is of material importance to practitioners, and therefore they seem well worthy of a brief consideration. We propose first to take in hand the question concerning the relative authority of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction.

It will perhaps serve to clear this question of some confusion, if we begin by observing that this is not a question of the value and weight of precedents, upon the usual grounds of reasoning by which precedents are estimated. A precedent is followed because, so long as it has prevailed, it must have affected in some degree the conduct and dealings of the public, and must have been received with more or less of acknowledgment or acquiescence; and the weight of a precedent is measured chiefly by the degree of acquiescence with which it is received. In this sense, every judgment of a properly constituted tribunal becomes a precedent to every other tribunal; and even the judgment of an inferior court becomes a precedent for the guidance of a superior court, or a court of appeal. This characteristic effect of a precedent, even in a court of error, was well explained by Parke, B., in the judgment which overruled the celebrated case of Godsall v. Boldero (Dalby v. India Life Assurance Company, 24 L. J., C. P., 2):—"Though we are quite satisfied that the case of Godsall v. Boldero was founded on a mistaken analogy and wrong, we should hesitate to overrule it, though sitting in a court of error, if it had been approved and followed and not questioned, though many opportunities had been offered to question it. We do not think we ought to feel ourselves bound by it, as so few, if any, subsequent cases have arisen in which the soundness of the principle then relied upon could be made the subject of judicial inquiry, and as in practice it may be said that it has been constantly disregarded."

A judgment of a superior court, however, is cited before an inferior court, not merely as a precedent or argument which may be accepted or repudiated, but as an authority which can only be obeyed. The sub-ordinate court defers to the judgment of the super-ordinate one, not from a submission of conviction, but in obedience to its higher authority. What, then, is the relation with respect to mere authority subsisting between co-ordinate courts? When a judgment of a co-ordinate court is cited, is any submission due to its authority irrespective of the weight which it may reasonably bear as an argument from precedent? This seems to be the precise form of the question, which is so constantly intervening in practice where the same or similar points are discussed before the several co-ordinate courts.

The solution of this question, upon grounds of principle, seems to rest in the conception of co-ordinate courts; and this conception may be elucidated in the manner most suitable for our present purpose by the state of the courts actually referred to under that designation. The three superior courts of common law are commonly thus described, and so likewise are the Vice-Chancellors' courts in equity. Now the former at the present day all exercise necessarily the same jurisdiction, and stand in precisely equal rank or order in the constitution of the judicature. Their civil jurisdiction, originally very different, have, first by various strange self-originated devices and fictions, such as writs of quo minus, latitat, and bills of Middlesex, and ultimately by statutes settling a uniformity of process, attained precisely the same limits. The age of rivalry, conflict, and usurpation of jurisdiction between these courts, has passed away; and there is now one jurisdiction, one procedure, virtually one court, though for the convenience and despatch of business, three chambers—a state of things which seems imperatively to demand a uniformity of decision. The courts of the Vice-Chancellors in equity have been created with the same exact uniformity of position, procedure, and jurisdiction, and therefore, it would seem, with the same necessity for the uniformity of decision. The two sets of courts, of common law and of equity, relatively to each other, are also commonly treated as co-ordinate; but though they may be ranked in position at the same level and dignity, they exercise jurisdiction of so different a description, that the judgments of the one can be seldom applied in any useful manner to the guidance or regulation of the other. Inasmuch, however, as courts of law have in some matters an equitable jurisdiction and conversely, to that extent the jurisdiction of the two sets of courts is the same; and, according to the best opinions, the decisions of the one are accepted by the other as binding authorities. As to courts inferior to these, such as county courts, magistrates' courts, &c., though strictly speaking they might be termed co-ordinate, yet, as they are instituted simply for the dispatch of small business, and not at all for the settlement of the law, difficult points of law arising before them being readily referred to superior tribunals, it would be mere pedantry to include them in the same category, or to attempt to subject them to the same considerations.

There is no doubt that every court is constituted in point of form with the power of delivering an arbitrary judgment on a matter within its jurisdiction; so that it has the power to decide contrary to a previous judgment of a co-ordinate court, and even of a court of appeal. But this power is entrusted to the court to be exercised according to a judicial discretion; and the real question is not as to the bare power or possibility of deciding, but what is a right and proper exercise of the power according to the discretion of a good judge. This distinction between mere formal power and the discretionary rules imposed upon its exercise is well recognised in many branches of the political constitution. Discretion tempers the exercise of power, as equity modifies the law. Thus, the Crown in point of form can refuse assent to a Bill which has passed both Houses of Parliament; but discretion peremptorily forbids the exercise of such power. The House of Lords has the power formally to propose and amend a Bill relating to taxation; but the rules of discretion, founded on the inexpediency and futility of so doing, prohibit any such interference with the prescriptive privilege of the Commons. With respect, therefore, to the submission of a court to another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, the question seems to be, what are the rules of discretion which intervene to guide the exercise of the absolute power of judging under the circumstances of the matter having been already adjudged by a co-ordinate court?

These rules are to be sought for and deduced from the practice of the courts, and the language of the judges in reference thereto; and a careful consideration of the precedents and practice on the subject appears to justify the following position.* The general rule of

* The following authorities may be cited in support of this and other positions taken in the above article. The Common Pleas having decided, in Selby v. Eden, 3 Bing. 611, that the simple acceptance of a bill drawn payable at a particular place was a general acceptance, the same point was soon after brought before the Queen's Bench; and Lord Tenterden, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court said, "I should certainly have entertained some doubt had it not been for the authority cited (Selby v. Eden). It is of great importance that there should be uniformity of decision in the different courts of Westminster Hall, upon all questions, but particularly upon questions affecting negotiable instruments of this description. Upon the authority of that case, therefore, we are of opinion, &c."

A great difference of opinion recently prevailed as to whether special contracts with carriers were within the Rail-way and Canal Traffic Act. In Wine v. Great Western Railway Company, 25 L. J. Ex. 258, the Exchequer having delivered judgment on grounds independent of the above point, added an opinion upon it, also sufficient to decide the case in the negative. In Simons v. Great Western Railway Company, practice is that, where a deliberate judgment of a co-ordinate court subsists unreversed it must be followed; and no further argument will be heard on the same point. Counsel may distinguish their case from the authority; but they may not dispute the authority except in a court of appeal. The practice of the courts in this matter is of every day occurrence, and is nearly invariable. Exceptions, it is true, have occurred in certain extreme cases; but they are so rare as to be almost capable of a particular enumeration. At any rate they have not as yet been frequent enough to have called forth any rule to account for their occurrence; and the tendency of modern practice is to carry out the above general rule with the utmost strictness. It may, however, be suggested with probability that the deliberate deviations from the general rule are restricted to cases in which the previous decision has manifestly emanated from mistake or inadvertence, and in which the Court itself would obviously, on being further advised on a future occasion, wish, if possible, to recall its own judgment. It may also be suggested that a Court would probably be much more cautious and respectful in dealing with 26 L. J. C. P. 25, the Common Pleas considering the point open, notwithstanding the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, expressly decided it in the affirmative. The point then came before the Queen's Bench, in Peck v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, 27 L. J. Q. B. 465, where the judges differed. Lord Campbell, C. J., and Crompton, J., concurred with the Common Pleas, the latter saying in his judgment, "I should feel myself bound by this decision of the Court of Common Pleas if I had arrived at a contrary conclusion; and I should have contented myself with merely stating that I felt bound by the decision of the Court of Common Pleas if I had not known that one of my learned brothers in this court and some of the learned members of another court take a contrary view." Erle, J., thought that the case in the Exchequer amounted to an authority, and therefore considered himself, he said, at liberty to dissent from the Common Pleas.

In the case of Chapman v. Monmouthshire Railway Company, 27 L. J. Ex. 97, Willes, J., having ruled at Nisi Prius in accordance with his own private opinion contrary to the judgment of the Queen's Bench, the full Court, on the case being referred to it, delivered the following judgment by the Chief Baron:—"We have consulted with my brother Willes, who states that he intended to decide contrary to the case of the Queen v. London and North Western Railway Company, we are bound to decide in accordance with that case." [And see further as to this point, Powell v. Jessop, 25 L. J. C. P. 199; Taylor v. Burgess, 5 H. & N. 1; and innumerable other cases.]

Jackson v. Woolley, 27 L. J. Q. B. 181, was an instance of the Court of Queen's Bench following the decision of a Vice-Chancellor. Kindersley, V.C., had decided that the 14th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act was retrospective; and upon the same point being brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, it held itself bound by that decision. Lord Campbell, C. J., said, "We are bound by the decision in Thompson v. Waithman. We express no opinion upon the proper construction of the Act, as far as this court is concerned it is res integra, and the plaintiff must go to a court of error if he wishes to review that decision." The decision was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber, where Williams, J., delivering judgment said, "The Court of Queen's Bench were quite correct in bowing to the decision of the Vice-Chancellor in Thompson v. Waithman, a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction."

In Jones v. Harrison, 6 Ex. 328, the Court of Exchequer construed the word "may" in the 13th section of the County Court Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, as discretionary. In Mac Dougal v. Paterson, 11 C. B. 755, the Court of Common Pleas held it to be obligatory, because, as it said, the former decision led to manifest absurdity and repugnancy, and the Court of Queen's Bench, in Crake v. Powell, 21 L. J. Q. B. 183, followed the Common Pleas. The Court of Exchequer subsequently expressed the intention of reversing their decision, and abiding by that of the other courts (Asplin v. Blackman, 21 L. J. Ex. 78).

In Cook v. Gillard, 1 E. & B. 83, the Court of Queen's Bench decided upon the construction of a statute contrary to the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Irimey v. Marks, 16 M. & W. 643, on the ground that the latter court had manifestly decided under a mistake arising from their not advertent to certain legislative changes in the law the decision of another Court, than it would in reviewing its own.

The general rule which compels a Court to bow to the decision of a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction seems also to be based upon grounds of expediency and public convenience. Certainty is a high qualification of law; and this rule eliminates one element of uncertainty by preventing the collision of co-ordinate courts and a conflict of judicial opinions. It is said, on the other hand, that to prevent one court from questioning and impugning the decisions of another, tends to aggravate and perpetuate the evils of doubtful or bad law. It is true, a subsequent contradictory decision would serve to throw increased discredit on a previous one already discredited by public opinion; but it would not get rid of it in the same way that it is overruled by a court of appeal; it would only alter the degree of doubt without removing it, and would necessarily involve a recourse to further proceedings. The rule in question guards all decisions equally, good and bad, from being subjected to doubt, except in that way in which alone the doubt can be usefully and effectually raised. It sends the doubt at once to the court of appeal, which alone could decide between conflicting decisions; and it thus avoids unnecessary and objectless litigation, which would otherwise be interposed in the course of a suit.

The contrary rule, operating equally on all decisions, whether good or bad, would open to dispute and litigation nearly every proposition of law, and would invite as many different opinions as there are judges. The attention of suitors would be turned to the idiosyncracies of the courts and judges, rather than to the simple object of a final decision of the cause. To allow a decision to be called in question whenever it suited the circumstances of a suitor, or of his legal advisers to do so, would increase expense and prolong litigation. The ensuing diversity of opinions would introduce uncertainty throughout the whole of the law; the public would be greatly embarrassed in their conduct and affairs; no titles would be safe; and no transactions could be sufficiently guarded.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

This is the season of the year when cabinet councillors go through the unwelcome duty of reviewing their legislative failures of the preceding summer. In the present autumn, notwithstanding the apology has been offered to constituencies, that a greater number of useful legal reforms have been made during the 23 & 24 Vict. than for many a year past, the chiefs who are responsible for the Parliamentary programme must deliberate, in view of the next session, under a consciousness that the successful law measures of the last were principally the work of independent members, while the unsuccessful and the abortive were precisely those which had been heralded in the Queen's Speech. Her Ministers, then, have had ample reason for discussing at their recent meetings the causes of miscarriage, not only such as were of a party and personal nature in the House, but also the technical causes inherent in the Government system of drawing Bills. With the struggles for majorities, or the winning arts of debate, we are not much concerned. The policy, too, of each proposed law measure must, of course, be judged on its own grounds. But the frame of legislation, whether relating to professional or other matters, involves abiding general principles, the neglect of which is a subject peculiarly belonging to a legal journal. Among them there is one principle necessarily underlying whatever plan, in the vacancy caused by the loss of Mr. Coulson, may be adopted for securing, or attempting to secure, accuracy, completeness, and consistency, in Government as well as other Bills.

Whether a Parliamentary officer or committee, a commission or a minister of justice, be constituted to preserve order in the Statute Book, no success can be accomplished without a proper division of labour between the authors and the framers of measures. A clear perception of the difference between the functions of the legislature and of the draftsman would tend to allay even the jealousy which Parliament is supposed to feel at the apprehended interference by any new machinery with the free exercise of its sovereign powers and privileges. The confusion which has hitherto existed between official and professional responsibilities, in preparing the work of legislation, has encouraged an ill-defined alarm, that the latter cannot be regulated without encroaching on the former. At the same time such confusion has been in a high degree detrimental in weakening the responsibilities themselves.

When a Bill originates with a public department, the instructions in different cases vary exceedingly in their form and detail. They do not generally go much into particulars. To the conveyancer employed is left the speculative task of giving effect to the intentions of the introducers of the Bill. So loose is the system, that frequently the instructions come orally from a Secretary of State: most frequently, indeed, there is neither signature, nor date, nor any writing at all. Thus unauthenticated they are sometimes not communicated to the draftsman by the head of the department. A secretary or subordinate is employed as the precarious go-between. He may or may not be imbued with the policy which prompted the measure, or be master of its general bearings, or comprehend its particular operations; yet he is customarily the medium between the intelligence which conceives and the intelligence which imparts substance to the conception.

It requires no very special knowledge to be in a position to appreciate the practical effect of such inexactness of duties. The head of a department originating a Bill is satisfied mainly with a conviction of the principle on which it is to be based, and does not extend his contemplation beyond the disturbance which it may produce in the interests represented by one troublesome deputation and another, which has recently quitted his presence. If, in addition, he has suggested clauses sufficient to guard against the Scylla faction on the particular question in the opposition, and the Charybdis faction among his own supporters, he passes on to other business with a consciousness of having done his duty not only as a legislator, but as a party man. The parliamentary scribe will look to the rest, and design and fit all the secondary and minuter parts. The draftsman, on his side, receives the political, commercial, or legal hints, as the case may be, vouchsafed from high quarters, with his head full of precedents and forms, but in comparative, if not total, ignorance of the actual circumstances in which the measure is to work. The Bill is thus drawn in perfect harmony between the two. Neither gives the other any vulgar trouble upon it. If the lesser artist's professional precedents do not happen to square with the greater artist's official exigencies, it is altered accordingly. "I do not, of course," Mr. Coulson told a select committee, "raise any controversy with him; I say, I have no doubt misunderstood you." If anything should be wanting, there will still be the "many cooks" in committee to supply their ingredients. What must be the result on the Statute Book of this easy-going division of labour? What would have been the result on steam locomotion, if, thirty years ago, Robert Stephenson had instructed a founder that steam pressed at so much a square inch: "I want something to run upon wheels by steam; you will see to the cylinders, cocks, valves, and all that!" It requires, we say, no special knowledge to judge of such a system. But they who know by experience, how crude, for the working purposes of life, is the production of a conveyancer whom a client, under some unusual pressure of circumstances, has instructed, by an endorsement on a blank sheet, or at the foot of some hasty half dozen paragraphs, to draw a Bill in Parliament, a partnership deed, or a settlement, how much the draftsman leaves in blank, how many queries he puts in the margin, how cautious the reservations he makes in his approval, and how many conferences will be needed by the solicitor with his clients on the one hand, and with his counsel on the other, and finally, with both together, before the machine runs easily on its wheels at the proper gauge. Anyone who has experience of all this, can well form an opinion as to what sort of laws the public is justified in expecting from Government Bills.

The steps to be taken for remedying this state of things have not, we believe, been decided upon by the Government. In coming to a decision, account must be taken, not alone, of the multifarious duties which, as we recently showed, pressed upon the late Mr. Coulson. There must be organised distinct machineries, one, departmental, for designing Bills, with a view to their safe and effectual operation in detail, and another, general, for drawing Bills, in order that the intention may be precisely carried out in enactments worded effectively and in harmony with the rest of the statute book. To constitute the latter organization for putting legislative measures into bodily shape, not one man or any number of individuals will avail. There must be some kind of parliamentary conveyancing staff brought into action, consisting of members representing the several offices of the State, and worked in combination by a chief. Their speciality would be knowledge of the statute law for the purposes of, so to say, tending and keeping the Statute Book in its annual growth. There are, doubtless, difficulties respecting the particular time and mode of the action of such a body during the pendency of a Bill, so as not to impede or cripple the function of the Legislature itself. We think them overrated.

These difficulties must be overcome. The plain course would appear to be, to refer all Bills to the conveyancing body, through a joint standing committee of both Houses, as a last stage before the Queen's assent. Alterations made in this stage might be communicated to the Speaker and to the Lord Chancellor, who would notify them to the respective Houses. Within a limited time, any member, who saw reason, might move upon the alterations; otherwise the Bill, as altered, might pass for the Queen's assent. We shall be answered, that the greater number of the Bills of a session are passed in the last ten days of it, and that then time fails for a conveyancing review of them. The only reply necessary is, that such a review would tend to substitute order in the place of that indecent and mischievous scramble, with which the adult Westminster school now usually breaks up for the holidays.

STATISTICS OF THE BANKRUPTCY COURTS FOR 1859.

The statistics of the bankruptcy courts for the past year are tabulated under the three distinct heads of bankruptcy, proceedings by private arrangement under the control of the court, and proceedings for winding up joint stock companies. Under the first head the petitions for adjudication by creditors in the London and seven provincial courts numbered 648; the petitions for adjudication by traders against themselves, 314; of both of which classes of petitions 912 were prosecuted to adjudication; while the number of petitions for private arrangement under the control of the court, upon which adjudications in bankruptcy were made, was only 31. The total number of persons declared bankrupt under these proceedings, whether trading singly or in partnership, amounted to 1,054, of whom 893 passed their last examination.

The total amount of debts upon the balance sheets in the foregoing cases was £3,645,037. The bankruptcies ranged as follows:—21 were for sums under £300; 70 were under £500; 222 under £1,000; 439 under £5,000; 73 under £10,000; 31 under £20,000; 22 under £50,000; 2 under £100,000; and 3 above £100,000. Of this large amount, which averages in each case £4,081, or £29 0s. 6d. per cent. on the balance sheets, £1,057,834 were realized by the court, after deducting from which £118,641 for special charges, such as mortgages, rents, &c.; £939,193 remained for administration. Of this sum the bankrupts' allowance formed £1 13s. 6d. per cent.; excepted articles, 19s. 8d. per cent.; accountants' charges, 18s. 8d.; solicitors' charges, £13 19s. 2d.; court per centage, £3; remuneration and expenses of official assignees, £5 6s. 6d.; brokers' charges, 11s. 3d.; auctioneers' charges, £1 14s. 5d.; messengers' charges, £2 14s. 3d.; other charges ordered by the court, and including sums expended for carrying on trade, &c., £2 13s. 9d. All these expenses reduce the total for dividend by one-third (£33 11s. 2d. per cent.).

This great expense of administration is what has occasioned the chief complaints against the existing system of bankruptcy. The official assignees and the accountants appear to be exceedingly overpaid. The court per centage should of course be abolished, there being no argument in favour of a tax upon persons already burdened by the defaults of the bankrupt. The miscellaneous item is not so much an expenditure as a deduction from the receipts; for special payments surely are payments nevertheless, and not preliminary costs of administration. The bankrupts' allowance and the excepted articles in like manner are a deduction from receipts, and not an element of expenditure. The real expenses, therefore, are only £28 4s. 3d. per cent. This, if reduced by the abolition of the court per centage, and by a reduction of the remuneration of the official assignees to a reasonable scale, would not leave the costs of administration much beyond £20 per cent. Indeed, these two deductions are alone, strictly speaking, expenses of administration; and although they are equally lost under any denomination to the creditors, yet these should remember that the speedy conversion of a trading estate into cash cannot be effected with the ordinary cost of collecting debts. The official assignees, however, as appears by a letter from one of the Birmingham district in the Times of the 12th November last, enjoy most profitable stations. In 1858, of the four official assignees at Birmingham one realized £4,960, the others £4,000. The writer, however, referring to the solicitors' costs, which he considered the more odious item, stated, that the estimate of those he gave would become much greater if two or three estates of exceptional magnitude were excepted out of the list. Such an exception, however, would militate only against the assignees, inasmuch as it shows that the remuneration of these officers so far bore no relation to the work done by them; while it would prove the contrary as to the solicitors' costs, which, nevertheless, we should be glad to see at as low a figure as the effective discharge of professional duties may admit. Debts were paid in full to the amount of £8,990. The remainder of the total realised was paid away in dividends, being an average of £18 17s. 1d. per cent. on the total debts in the balance-sheets, and £73 3s. 5d. on the amount realised for administration. The dividends were made as follows:—In 373 cases there was no dividend; in 610 cases the dividend was under 2s. 6d.; in 231 cases it was from 2s. 6d. to 5s.; in 100 from 5s. to 7s. 6d.; in 47 from 7s. 6d. to 10s.; in 36 from 10s. to 15s.; in 4 from 15s. to 20s.; and in 20, upwards of 20s. The certificates granted were, first class immediate, 100; second class, immediate, 390; suspended, 59; third class, immediate, 216; suspended, 10. Certificates were refused in 10 cases with protection; in 20 cases without it. The commissioners noted the apparent causes of the bankruptcies. They attributed 295 cases to reckless and unsound speculations and excessive trading; 124 cases to interest, discounts, accommodation bills, and suretyship; 323 cases to incompetence, neglect, and personal extravagance; thus attributing only 145 cases to unavoidable misfortune. There were 43 appeals, 7 of which were in one case; in 21 the judgment was affirmed; in 12 reversed; in 7 varied; and 3 were pending or abandoned. The proportion of the business transacted in the several courts was as follows:—in the London Court, which has 5 commissioners, 48.1 per cent. of the cases were determined; in the Birmingham Court 15.3 per cent.; in the Leeds Court, 10.9; in the Liverpool Court, 8.2; in the Bristol Court 6.4; in the Manchester Court, 5.5 in the Exeter Court, 3.7; and in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Court, 1.9.

A very remarkable difference appears in the proportion which the amounts of the dividends bear to the amounts in the balance-sheets in the different courts. Thus, in the Leeds Court the dividend was £66 17s. 2d. per cent. upon the amount of debt in the balance-sheets; in the Exeter Court it was £21 17s. 2d.; in the Liverpool Court, £20 17s. 11d.; in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Court, £20 7s. 4d.; in the London Court, £15 11s. 8d.; in the Manchester Court, £13 3s. 7d.; in the Bristol Court, £12 6s. 3d.; and in the Birmingham Court, £9 1s. 4d. It is an interesting question in the philosophy of trade, but not appertaining to our province, to investigate the local and specific causes which thus diversify the ratios of solvency of which Leeds and Birmingham are mutual antipodes. It is unpleasant to find the ratio so small in London, in which so large an amount of the failures occurred; while Liverpool is steady, notwithstanding the varied speculations of which it is the centre.

The bankruptcies gazetted during the eleven months ending November 30 this year, amount to 1,141; being at the rate of 1,245 per annum. The ratio of this year is therefore above the average of the last ten years, which was 1,090. The returns of the several districts for the last eleven months are as follows:—London, 569; Birmingham, 185; Leeds, 100; Bristol, 88; Liverpool, 63; Manchester, 57; Exeter, 45; and Newcastle, 34. These figures indicate still further tendencies in London and Birmingham to rise above the average in the other districts; while Liverpool and Manchester show symptoms of progressive advancement in this as in the other features of their trade.

The proceedings by private arrangements under the control of the court without bankruptcy for obtaining protection for person and property until further order, and release, if necessary, from imprisonment under statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106 were for the year 1859 as follows: Petitions filed and followed by proceedings of this latter character exclusively without an adjudication of bankruptcy, 93; petitions in course of prosecution during the year, under which resolutions of creditors have passed for vesting the estates of the petitioners, 66; of which 35 cases were without the intervention of the official assignees, being carried out by private trustees. The total number of petitioners, whether trading singly or in partnership, was 123. The total amount of the debts in the balance-sheets filed by the petitioners was £921,154; and was classed as follows: 6 petitions were for debts under £1,000; 29 under £5,000; 8 under £10,000; 8 under £20,000; 4 under £50,000; 3 under £100,000; and 2 above £1,000,000. The total amount received in this department by the official assignees for administration was £43,541. The expenses of the administration of these assets were the comparatively moderate sum of £6,057, or £13 18s. 2d. per cent. The special charges for rent, &c., amounted to £3,268; and debts of the total amount of £4,117 were paid in full. After these deductions, the dividends were as follows:—in three cases, nil; in 14, under 2s. 6d. in the pound; in 9, under 5s.; in 10, under 7s. 6d.; in 2, under 10s.; and in 2, 10s. and upwards. The number of certificates granted approving of the resolutions of creditors under section 216 of the Bankrupt Act, 1849, was 70; the number of certificates granted of the resolutions having been carried into effect was 16. As to arrangements by deed, there were 13 petitions filed, and 12 orders made.

The amount of the debts bear no relation to the gross produce of the estates, in cases where the official assignee is trustee alone, or jointly with others, returned as £31,531. The estates which were assigned to, or vested in, trustees, or in which a composition was paid by the petitioner without the intervention of the official assignees, being practically withdrawn from the control of the court, no returns of the dividends appear. The court should, we think, in future enforce a return and record of the dividends in these cases, in order to supply statistical data for the guidance of the Legislature as to the degree of favour which private arrangements should enjoy in comparison with judicial adjudication.

We consider that private arrangements cannot meet with too great favour. The more extensively the laissez faire principle is applied in judicial as well as in ordinarily commercial matters, the more nearly will positive legislation approach precision in its enactments, and success in its application; while a redundant statute book is its own greatest impediment.

The profession would not suffer any loss by this divergence of a portion of the existing business in bankruptcy into a civil sphere of judicature. On the contrary, we know that arbitrations, although a similar transference of the judicial, by no means form the least productive tributary to professional income. The proceedings under the Winding-up Act (statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45) for the winding-up of joint stock companies have fallen almost exclusively to the London Court.

The proceedings under the Winding-up Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 45), for the winding up of Joint Stock Companies, have fallen almost exclusively to the London Court. The number of petitions under Winding-up Acts against, or by, such companies was 17; orders made, 11; petitions pending 27. The total amount of debts due by the companies was £223,794. Calls were made upon 2,234 contributories, amounting to £58,117, of which the receipts for calls are stated at £7,169; the gross produce of the estates was £180,316; special charges for rent, &c., amounted to £74,662; total received for administration, including monies received for calls, was £111,738; the total expenses of administration were £8,378. The amount of dividends ordered, nine-tenths of which were to debenture holders as preferential creditors at 20s. in the pound, was £100,482. Of the eleven orders made in the year for winding up 9 were in cases which have been completed, the dividends in which were under 2s. 6d. in the pound in 3 cases; under 5s. in 4 cases; and were 20s. in the pound in the remaining 2 cases.

The number of appeals was 4, in two of which judgment was affirmed, in 1 reversed, and in 1 was pending.

The questions which at present engage most attention in this branch of the law are the amalgamation of insolvency with bankruptcy, the sanctioning of private arrangements, the distinction of the unfortunate from the fraudulent debtors by a release from past liabilities as to all future acquired property, as also by certificates, or, on the other hand, penalties, and, above all, as a matter most in the power of the law to effect, though not in itself the most important, the lessening of the present expenses of administering the assets. With regard to the first head, we answer in the affirmative, without supporting this opinion by arguments in detail; inasmuch as the onus probandi lies on those who seek the dismemberment of the law, and its administration in wholly distinct channels. The grant of a release as to all future acquired property should, we think, be determined not by the commercial or non-commercial character of the transactions of the debtor, but by his honest or fraudulent conduct. This could, we think, be better determined by the creditors, who would thus act as a jury determining a fact, than by the judge, in whom such a discretion would tend to bring the administration of the law into occasional conflict and discredit with the mercantile public.

The expense of punishing mercantile as well as all other species of fraud, should of course fall on the public. The comparative cheapness of transactions by private arrangement may suggest some means of reducing the expenses of the court, and, at all events, recommends this method of procedure to yet greater favour with the mercantile public.

In insolvency, 2,765 petitions were filed, 23 of which were by creditors. Of the insolvents, 23 had professions; 26 were officers of the army or navy; 88 clerks; 1,686 traders; 16 lodging-house keepers; 44 shopmen; 179 agents; 47 manufacturers; 176 mechanics; 88 graziers, farmers, millers, &c.; and 322 of other classes. There was a decrease of nearly one-fifth in the number of petitioners compared with the returns of the previous year. The low amount of the debts is a proof of the poverty of the insolvents, as the report observes; of more than one-half the total debt did not reach £500; and almost one-fourth had previously been insolvent or bankrupt; 484 once, 118 twice, and 14 above thrice. The debts ranged as follows:—

£100 and under £300	781
£300 " £500	562
£500 " £1,000.....	598
£1,000 " £3,000.....	414
£5,000 and above	73

The number of insolvents who appeared for hearing in the London Court was 799; in the county courts, 1,895. In the former court 7 petitions were dismissed on hearing; in the latter courts, 126. Adjudications for immediate discharge were made in 2,104 cases. The insolvents in the other cases were imprisoned for periods varying from one month to two years.

The number of estates realised was 196; the dividends declared thereon, £31,561 0s. 6d.; the average of each estate consequently was £161 0s. 6d. The expenses of the administration were in all £5,217 10s. 4d.; being for each estate £26 12s. 5d. The dividends averaged £8 8s. per cent. on the amount of the scheduled debts, and £12 15s. on the amount ascertained for dividend, and varied as follows:—

1s. and under 2s. 6d.	70
2s. 6d. " 5s.	40
5s. " 10s.	19
10s. " 15s.	4
15s. " 20s.	4
20s.	7

Besides the foregoing cases, the debtors in 36 other instances cleared off their debts amounting to £54,576 12s. 8d. either by payments, or by having obtained releases.

Under the Protection Acts, a trader, whose debts are under £300, is enabled, upon filing a petition containing a schedule of his debts and property, to obtain an order protecting him from arrest; whereupon his property is vested and administered as an insolvency. The total number of petitions under these Acts was 2,820. The amount of the scheduled debts was

£100 and under £300	256
£300 " £500	118

£500 and under £1,000	417
£1,000 " £3,000	234
£3,000 " £5,000.....	223
£5,000 and above	141

Compared with the proceedings in insolvency, these debts, as is noticed in the report, are of a higher average; and the previous insolvencies and bankruptcies proportionately less; of those previously before the Court there were 221 once; 27 twice; 7 thrice, and 2 above thrice. The number who appeared for hearing was, in the Insolvent Court, 971; in the county courts, 1,746; in the former court, 56; and in the latter courts, 238 petitions were dismissed on hearing. The relative amount of business in insolvency matters transacted in the Insolvent Debtors' Court and the county courts was as follows:—

UNDER THE INSOLVENCY ACTS.	Insolvent Court.	County Court.
Petitions filed.....	821	1,944.
Insolvents who appeared for hearing..	799	1,895.
Estates realized	73	122.
Proceeds whereon dividends declared	£10,552	£20,976.
Amount of scheduled debts.	£123,564	£187,919.
Debts satisfied by payment, or otherwise	£21,762	£32,613
UNDER THE PROTECTION ACTS.
Petitions and schedules filed	1,038	1,782
Petitioners who appeared for hearing	971	1,746
Estates realized	124	208
Value of estates, debts, and effects realized.....	£6,190	£12,602.
Scheduled debts	£77,731	£146,711

Imprisonment for debt was unknown to our common law, and is a statutory graft from the Roman jurisprudence, as shown ante, p. 85. Such a law is a bounty upon improvident credits; while, like an extortionate usurer, it makes the borrower pay much more than the value of the risk incurred by the creditor.

The grant of a release from future liability, which is both a tabula rasa and a tabula in naufragio, if made dependant in all cases upon conduct, would strongly check rash speculations; while all healthy developments of commercial enterprise are amply provided for by the Act conferring a limited liability. All men are to some extent traders, as all are political economists. It is not the degree to which men carry their commercial transactions that should determine their right to undertake further enterprises, but the honesty and prudence previously shown by them.

An eclectic amalgamation, therefore, of the best elements of the existing laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency is alike recommended by the first and soundest principles of law and commercial science.

THE PRESENT LAW OF THE SETTLEMENT OF REAL PROPERTY—THE STATUTE DE DONIS.

[COMMUNICATED.]

Pending the achievement of a general consolidation of the law, the amendment of a few of its branches deserves earnest attention, even if considered as experiments only in the path of codification. Now, no statute, or rule of common law, is so extensive in its operations as the Statute De Donis. All settlements are based on it; the intricacies of Fearn's attempts to throw light chiefly upon the nature of this class of remainders, while contingent; while many of the vexed questions of real property law have been owing to the attempts of incumbrancers to secure their charges upon these remainders after they became vested. In order to show the necessity of repealing the Statute De Donis, and of converting all estates tail into base fees, with the superadded power to support a remainder, to be, in short, as easily settled or incumbered as estates in fee simple, I shall endeavour to characterise the peculiar and injurious incidents of an estate tail as at present protected by the law. In the first place, it is often difficult to determine

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

I.

INTRODUCTION.

The word "domicile," or "domicil" as it is sometimes written, is of a modern introduction into our language, and should, if we have adopted it, I apprehend, to make it our own, be written in the latter mode, inasmuch as that spelling differs from that of all other words, having the same signification in other languages. It is not found in Johnson, but is in Todd's Johnson, extracted from an old work, but not having any meaning analogous to our interpretation. "Domicile" in the French, and "domicilio" in the Italian tongue, signify "a dwelling house;" and thus we have the verbs "se domicilier" and "fissare il domicilio" in those languages, signifying to settle in a place. The Latin "domicilium," I think, was not the same as "domus," although "domus" might mean something included in "domicilium." Littleton's Latin dictionary gives it "an abode," and quotes "sedes" from Cicero. But the word "house" refers more properly to the particular messuage or tenement, the particular structure in which we reside, than to the locality, town, village, parish, or country; whereas the "domicil" or "domicilium" includes that, and also takes in those other wider acceptations. It is not my purpose in the following pages to consider the laws of other countries upon this subject, except so far as they bear upon, and help to illustrate, the principle upon which our own proceeds; and I shall therefore touch upon them merely as I proceed, and as it seems to me necessary, to indicate the premises from which the different conclusions, hitherto arrived at by our judges and by our legislature, have been drawn. It seems to be at this moment in extreme doubt what is the proper definition of the word "domicil." Different interpretations have been proposed, and sought to be given of it. Sometimes it has been defined to mean "residence" only, sometimes "residence with an intention to remain," sometimes mere length of time—a number of years—spent in one place; but it is evident that all these only serve to shew the difficulty, without in the least removing it; and moreover, it is not by any means clear what "domicil" actually is, that is, under all circumstances. In America the question arises as to settlement and taxation. The mode in which the question arises in our courts of law or equity is usually with reference to the mode in which the property of a deceased person is to be dealt with, who has moved from place to place during his life, and who has to a certain extent, perhaps, acquired national or civil rights in more than one country. Thus a man born in England of English parents, and although he resides here for a few years of his early youth, possesses ipso facto an English domicil of origin; he then leaves this country for some other, either by emigration or otherwise, amasses property there, becomes a citizen of a state, or acquires the rights of a born subject of that country. In the meantime, circumstances have arisen that render a return to his native country expedient; either he finds it by the death of relatives and the acquisition of property proper that he should return, or knowing when he has enough, and having prospered in business, his mind reverts to his native soil, and natural ties which have been so long severed, and he returns and dies. This is the ordinary case, and although there are certain principles well recognised and established on the subject, yet it is obvious that even in such an apparently simple case circumstances may so vary one case from another in the same class, as to make it to the last degree doubtful how those principles apply to each; and in this it is that the present unsatisfactory state of the law upon this subject (for it must be admitted to be unsatisfactory) consists. The law of domicil may be said to be analogous to the law of construction, inasmuch as the various circumstances under which a man passes an eventful and roving life may be fairly compared to the various vagaries which fill men's minds, and flow from their pens with regard to the ultimate disposal of their property. On questions of construction, as we all know, the principles are well established, and the whole difficulty lies in applying them to the case before us; and although in both cases "intention" is the grand governing indication to proceed upon, we cannot look into the mind of the person otherwise than as appears by his acts and words, written or spoken, and these are often so contradictory that, instead of assisting us, they lead us into a far greater mass of uncertainty. There is likewise a farther analogy between the two cases, that in both, attendant circumstances are allowed to be called in aid to show what the "intention" was, as a kind of corroborative evidence in the case, the only difference being that in the case of a testamentary instrument, we have a written foundation to go upon; whereas in a case of domicil, the acts, coupled perhaps with the letters of the party, are the basis upon which the question must be decided. Laws were framed, not only for the restraining of crime and wrongful acts, and for the preservation of property, but for the proper transmission of that property from one person to another, or failing that, that it should contribute to the national wealth, by escheat or forfeiture to the crown or sovereign power; and hence every member of a state, and every subject of a country, possesses property distributable and controllable by the laws of that country of which he is a subject. The question of his domicil thus naturally arises, and an important question it is, for the duties and taxes imposed upon the transmission of property are as different in different countries as the general scope of the legislative enactments, and to this even those distant lands which are under our government are not an exception; for it happens (I mention this by way of example) that legacy duty is not payable upon Indian property even within our own rule, neither is duty payable upon charitable bequests in Ireland, although a portion of the United Kingdom; and hence, so far, these, although component parts of one great scheme of government, are as much foreign countries as any other foreign state. All this renders the law of domicil as important as it is involved in uncertainty; and the author of these observations has considered that a volume bringing under the notice of the legal public the numerous branches of this subject somewhat more in detail than it has at present been brought may not be without its use, particularly when it is considered that both our peaceful and our warlike relations have with the wonderful march of invention in our own day contributed to render travel so facile, both temporarily and pecuniarily speaking; and to make national both personal friendships and ties of such a much more frequent and lasting character, than of yore between this country and the continent of Europe, even extending far into Asia; thereby also extending the probability of permanent residences by natives of all those countries to the others. The nice shades of distinction which have existed with regard to residence in foreign countries, are very singular to observe in the cases that have been brought for adjudication, and which distinctly go to show what it is that constitutes a domicil, although it may still be difficult to give it such a definition as will hit every case. Thus it has happened that every possible indication of intention has been shown to abandon a native country, and settle and reside permanently in a foreign one; where even the whole property of the individual has been invested in that foreign country, estates and titles purchased and large sums expended in ornamenting and beautifying the subject of the investment, and yet, if it so happened that possession was not actually taken, the

for the loss resulting from their subsequent trading. There was a further question between them as to the manner in which the sale had been conducted. The Vice-Chancellor Stuart decided the case upon the principles ordinarily applicable to the duties of a mortgagee in possession. "If," said his Honour, "a mortgagee who has property pledged to him and gets possession of that property uses it for the purposes of any speculation or adventure, and the speculation or adventure turns out a losing affair, the mortgagee and not the mortgagor must bear the result, whatever it may be, of that loss." His Honour further decided that the defendants were liable not only to such loss but also in the amount of the deterioration in value caused by such use of the ship. The Vice-Chancellor's judgment, which is very elaborate, further contains some observations relative to the duties of mortgagees of a ship exercising their statutory power of sale, which are well worthy the attention of those who are interested in such matters.

It is a curious fact that no similar case is to be found in any of the reports either at common law or in equity; and the Vice-Chancellor, perhaps on that account appears carefully to have avoided any dicta upon the general question as to the power of a mortgagee of a ship to take possession thereof—not for the purpose of sale, but for the purpose of realising his security by working the ship. His judgment as to this point proceeds entirely upon the ground of a speculative and adventurous employment of the ship by the mortgagees. Nothing appears to have turned in the argument upon the status of such a mortgagee under the provisions of the Act above alluded to; but it may be observed that the words of the 70th section favour the notion that a mortgagee of a ship—just as a mortgagee of real estate—is not prevented from taking possession of the mortgaged property for the purpose of paying the mortgage debt out of the profits of the mortgaged property by its use. That section treats him as the owner of the ship so far as may be necessary for making it "available as a security for the mortgage debt." The only way of accomplishing this object would be either by using the ship or selling it; but sect. 71 goes on to confer upon the mortgagee "power absolutely to dispose of the ship." However, admitting this to be the right construction of the Act, there must almost always be a difficulty in drawing the line, in the case of a ship, between what is speculative on the one hand, and what is bad management on the other. The most analogous class of cases, perhaps, are those relating to the duties of a mortgagee in possession of mines, where the mortgagee is allowed for such outlay as he might have himself contracted as a prudent owner; while he is disallowed any losses arising from a merely speculative undertaking. It is of the essence of the shipping trade to be adventurous and speculative, and therefore any attempt by a mortgagee to work the ship, for the purpose of discharging his mortgage debt, must always be attended with considerable risk. The present case, however, also shows that the mortgagee may contract no less liability in a sale of a ship. The observations of the Vice-Chancellor in his judgment, prove the importance in the first place of selling with as little delay as possible, so as to guard against any liability in respect of deterioration, and in the next place of conducting the sale in a provident and judicious manner.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF LIBEL—NEWSPAPER ARTICLES.

Paris v. Levy, 9 W. R., C. P., 74.

This is an important addition to the list of decisions elucidatory of the law of libel; and in particular of that part of such law which concerns articles in newspapers or other periodicals which, being in the nature of a comment on a written publication, happen to be damaging to the character of some person referred to in such comment, or to the book which he has written. The facts of the case itself are not such as can be conveniently put into an abbreviated form; but the dicta of Mr. Justice Byles, and Mr. Justice Keating, in discharging a rule which the plaintiff had obtained for setting aside the verdict for the defendant, and for a new trial, are well worthy of consideration.

The effect of Mr. Justice Byles's judgment was as follows. The law allows a privilege to a fair comment (either written or oral) on a literary production, and allows such to be published, although it may fall within the general definition of a libel or slander, as tending to bring another into ridicule and contempt. But in such a comment no attack upon private character can be allowed. And Mr. Justice Keating added to this that, in his opinion, it was incumbent, even, upon a newspaper to make fair comments upon any publication before them, so that they did not degenerate into imputations of a personal character.

CRIMINAL LAW.

AGGRAVATED ASSAULT—EVIDENCE OF MALICE, WHEN REQUIRED.

Reg. v. Sparrow, 9 W. R., C. C. R., 58.

The substantial point here raised for the opinion of the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases reserved, was one which has often before been judicially considered—viz., the circumstances under which the law will imply an intention. It is perfectly clear, for example, that a killing which shall be without "malice aforethought" does not amount to the crime of murder. But such malice may be either express or implied; and will be implied in many cases of homicide—as in the common instance given in the books of killing an officer of justice while resisting him in the lawful execution of his duty with a legal warrant, and knowing his authority, or the object with which he interposes. Here the law will imply malice—the necessary ingredient to make out the crime of murder; and thus, too, where one man assaults another, and strikes him with blows calculated to cause grievous bodily harm, and which blows, in point of fact, do cause such harm, the law will imply an "intention" to cause harm of that nature, so as to bring the crime within 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 4, or other statutable enactment against malicious infliction of grievous bodily harm. And this, though the evidence establishes, and the jury confirm by their finding, that there was no premeditation on the part of the offender.

It is, however, to be observed that there are other cases in which it is essential that there appear to have been, on the part of the person accused, a specific intention to commit the offence with which he is charged. Thus, if a statute makes the intention part of the offence—as, for example, the being armed by night with offensive weapons with intent to break into a building—evidence of such intent must be given; and it may be inferred from the nature of the weapons found on the prisoner, the place where he was, his declarations, and the like.

In the particular case now under consideration, the prisoner was indicted for having maliciously inflicted bodily harm, and the jury found that such harm was inflicted, but "without premeditation," and under the influence of passion. The Court held him to have been rightly convicted.

EVIDENCE MUST BE CONFINED TO THE POINTS IN ISSUE—COLLATERAL FACTS.

Reg. v. Holt, 9 W. R., C. C. R., 61.

There is no rule of evidence more fundamental or more important than that which confines it to the points in issue. It is true that under certain circumstances collateral facts may be admitted, but these must in all cases be such as afford reasonable presumption with regard to the principal matter in dispute (Tay. Ev., 2nd ed. p. 288). On this principle of the law of evidence, it was, in one case, held by all the judges that an admission by a prisoner that he had at another time committed an offence similar to that with which he was charged, and that he had a tendency to perpetrate such crimes, could not be received (Reg. v. Cole, 1 Ph. Ev., p. 477). In the present case, the prisoner was convicted of obtaining money by false pretences, part of the evidence tendered on behalf of the Crown being to the effect that the prisoner, on a previous occasion, had obtained from another person a sum of money on a false pretence, similar to that which he was now charged with having made use of—such previous obtaining not being in any way referred to in the indictment. It is difficult to understand how, in the face of the decision of Reg. v. Cole, or even on general principles, such evidence could have been admitted at the trial; but it is satisfactory to be able to add that the conviction was quashed by the court of appeal.

Correspondence.

MAYOR'S AND SHERIFFS' COURT PRACTICE.

Can you, or any readers of the Solicitors' Journal, inform me if any works on the procedure of the mayor's and sheriffs' courts of London have been published, and if so, which is the latest and best authority on the subject? If no such works have been published, I shall be glad to know how the procedure of those courts respectively is regulated, how to ascertain their jurisdiction, and what Acts of Parliament relate to them.

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS OF IRELAND.

At the general meeting of the Incorporated Law Society held in the Solicitors Hall on the 27th November, R. J. T. Orpen, Esq., president, in the chair, the report of the council was made and confirmed. The first portion of the report deals with the new regulations for the education of this branch of the profession. The subjects of registration of judgments, fees in the Bankruptcy Court, delays in the registration of deeds office, and some minor topics, are referred to. The following paragraphs, being of general interest, are extracted from the report of the council, the concluding one having reference to two portraits of the late President and Vice-President of the Society, which have lately been placed in the Solicitors Hall.

EXTRACTS FROM REPORT OF THE COUNCIL.

A Bill was introduced into Parliament containing a clause under which the solicitor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners was to be paid a salary, and enacting that all costs received by him should be accounted for with the board, the result of which would be to enable the commissioners to receive their solicitor's costs.

Your council considered that any contract whereby the fees and profits properly chargeable by and payable to a solicitor by third parties and not by the client, should be paid to or for the benefit of any person whomsoever, save the solicitor himself, was highly objectionable, and that the operation of the clause referred to would be to cause all fees of whatsoever description formerly paid to the solicitor or attorney of the commissioners to be carried to the credit of their funds, and feeling that the principle involved in such clause was novel, and unless sanctioned by the authority of an Act of Parliament would be illegal, as being contrary to the spirit of the oath taken by every solicitor, prepared a petition to Parliament on the subject, and they have the satisfaction of stating that the clause was struck out of the Bill.

It having been stated to your council that one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery had declined to refer a bill of costs to a solicitor for taxation (or to be moderated), and had approved of its being taxed by a non-professional gentleman connected with one of the offices of his court, a deputation from your council waited on the Master in order to ascertain his feelings and opinion on the subject; and the Master was pleased to state that he would not adhere to the practice of referring costs to be moderated only by persons not solicitors, but would refer such costs either to a solicitor or to any other proper person whom the solicitor on both sides might agree on.

Your council have received the first annual report of the Cork Law Society, and trust that body will persevere and succeed in the object for which it has been established, which is of a kindred nature with this society, and calculated to advance the best interests of the profession in that locality; and your council trust that ere long similar societies will be established in each of the other three provinces. Such associations are in no respect calculated to clash with the interest of this the parent society, but rather tend to aid and strengthen its usefulness.

Your council perceive that a subject which had engaged the attention of this society has, by the exertion of the Cork Law Society, been fully accomplished, and deeds executed without stamps, or with insufficient stamps, can now be duly stamped on payment of the duties, without any penalty and without the production of an affidavit, provided they be presented at the chief office in Dublin for the purpose within 60 days from their date.

Your council, in the month of February last, presented a petition to Parliament, praying for the abolition of the solicitors' certificate duty, but they regret to say their effort has been unavailing.

Having adverted to the several transactions which have engaged attention during the past year, your council now, in conclusion, refer with very deep regret to the void which death has made amongst them and in the society, by the removal of two most valued and respected members—your late president and vice-president, Mr. William Goddard and Mr. Richard Meade—who were cut down within ten days of each other—the former in the fulness of years, the latter in the full vigour of manhood. They had, for many years, gone hand in hand together in the discharge of the duties of their high offices in your society, giving their best attention to every matter calculated to raise the social position of our profession, and to advance the best interests of your society. They have gone to their rest, respected and regarded by all, leaving for those who follow them bright examples of the course they should run who hope to win for themselves the like esteem of their fellow men.

In testimony of their respect, the profession at large entrusted to the management of your council a subscription to procure for your society portraits of their departed friends. The portraits have been painted by an eminent artist, and are now placed in the Solicitors' Hall, where we trust they will long be preserved as memorials of the sterling worth of those whose features they so faithfully represent.

It was then resolved that this meeting fully concurs in the sentiments of respect expressed in the report towards our late president and vice-president, Mr. Goddard and Mr. Meade, and we desire hereby to record the deep regret we feel for the loss the society has sustained by their deaths.

QUEENSTOWN.—A case recently came before the Petty Sessions Court at Queenstown, which will help to illustrate the fact that, while provision is made by the law for an inspection of the food and proper accommodation of a ship's crew—the magistrates having power to fine owners for a breach of the Act in that respect, in each case £20—yet they have no authority to order a survey or inspection of the ship's bottom, or her general seaworthiness, on the complaint of any unfortunate sailor who has signed articles to sail in her, but who may find her likely to be his coffin after a few days spent on board. The "White Jacket," a ship laden with salt, and bound for Calcutta, belonging to a large firm in Liverpool, put into the harbour about a fortnight since, under the following circumstances:—The captain, it seems, had objected that the vessel was overladen, but was offered the alternative to either proceed on the voyage or resign. He then consented to sail, but shortly after sailing he was compelled to put into Queenstown harbour. The owners being written to, sent over instructions that the vessel should be sent to sea again as she was. The captain and crew refused to proceed, and a new captain was sent on board, who swore that the ship was seaworthy and not overloaded, whereupon the men were arrested and lodged in gaol for mutiny. The magistrates, having no power to adjudicate on the seaworthiness of the ship, refused to punish the men or order them to proceed in what they considered a sinking ship. The vessel was afterwards brought back to Queenstown Harbour, having narrowly escaped being wrecked.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

FRANCE.—The atrocious murder of M. Poinot, one of the Presidents of the Imperial Law Courts, which took place in the night of Wednesday, the 5th instant, in a first-class carriage on the Strasbourg Railway, while he was returning to Paris to attend his judicial duties on the following day, has created the greatest consternation and excitement amongst all classes in Paris, more especially among the judges and other members of the legal profession, by whom he appears to have been held in high esteem. We are indebted to Galignani's Messenger for the following particulars relative to M. Poinot.

M. Poinot commenced life as simple clerk to an avocat at Bar-sur-Aube. He afterwards became advocate, and pleaded before the Civil Tribunal of Troyes. Among his clients at that place were the family of M. Casimir Périer. M. Poinot was 30 years in the magistracy. After having been Procureur du Roi at Troyes, he was appointed, in 1833, substitute at the Civil Tribunal of the Seine. He was afterwards named substitute of the Procureur-General of Paris, and, on the 14th of April, 1847, was nominated Advocate-General of the same court. He was dismissed on the 29th of February, 1848 (after the Revolution), but on the 2d of May of that year was appointed a judge of the Court of Appeal of Paris. On the 6th of April, 1857, he was named President of one of the chambers of the Imperial Court. The funeral of the late M. Poinot took place on Saturday at the church of St. Louis d'Antin, which was far too small to contain the number of people anxious to be present. The procession left the house of the deceased, in the Rue d'Isly, at 12 o'clock. The hearse and all the mourning coaches bore the cipher of the deceased. The chief mourners were MM. Audibert, Jules L'Homme, Gustave Royer, the nephews and cousin of M. Poinot. The pall was held by MM. Devienne, Chaix-d'Est-Ange, Perrot de Chérelle, sen., and Lenriot, all in their official robes. A numerous deputation from the different courts of law and tribunaux followed, also in their robes. M. Billaut and M. Ronland, Minister of Public Instruction, were present; and the Minister of Justice was represented by his secretary-general, M. Lascaux. Among the other legal functionaries who attended were MM. Dupin, Desparlies de Lassan, Alyies, Poulitier, Zangiacomi Debelleyne, Cordoen, and all the members of the Imperial Court to which the deceased belonged. Next came a deputation of advocates, preceded by the council of the order, headed by M. Jules Favre, the bâtonnier. Among the eminent members of the bar were MM. Berruyer, Senart, Dufaure, Cremieux, Marie, Coin-Delisle, &c. The service was celebrated by the curé of St. Louis, M. Martin de Noirlien, and at its conclusion the body was taken to the Strasbourg railway station, to be conveyed to the family vault at Chaource (Aube).

EXPENSES IN BANKRUPTCY. BY GEORGE A. ESSON, ACCOUNTANT IN BANKRUPTCY IN SCOTLAND.*

The facts and observations which the writer has to submit are confined to the administration of bankruptcy in Scotland.

It is not necessary, in this place, to enter upon any disquisition on the Scotch law relating to bankruptcy. It is proper, however, to explain, for the information of strangers, that the creditors in Scotland, on the award of sequestration (adjudication of bankruptcy), have the estates of their bankrupt debtors adjudged, or declared to belong to them, for the purposes of recovery and distribution. The creditors are, so to speak, constituted a corporation, for the special purposes of receiving and distributing the estates of bankrupts. They elect a trustee, who is their manager, or receiver, to whom their powers of recovery and distribution are delegated. They make choice also, from their own number, or from mandatories specially representing creditors, of three commissioners, who act as assessors, or a standing council to the trustee, to whom the trustee resorts for advice and direction in the course of his administration, on occasions on which it is necessary to appeal to the creditors themselves. The commissioners are the auditors of the trustee's accounts, and they fix his commission or remuneration, subject to the power of judicial appeal, on the part of the trustee.

It may be remarked that the necessity for the intervention of the courts, in the administration of bankruptcy, is occasional and not constant. Judicial sanction is required for certain acts of the creditors and of the trustee, in order to give them full binding effect. The award of sequestration, the confirmation of the elections of the trustee and commissioners, the examination of the bankrupt, his discharge, and the discharge of the trustee, are judicial acts, or require judicial sanction. These appeals, however, to the Court for administrative powers are readily and cheaply made; and they are competent in the sheriff (county) courts.

The expenses in bankruptcy may be classed under the following heads:—

- 1st. The Commission or Remuneration to the Trustee.
- 2nd. The Law Charges incurred to the Law Agents or Solicitors employed.
- 3rd. The Miscellaneous Expenses attending the Management of the Trustee; and
- 4th. The Expenses of the Judicial Administration of the Law of Bankruptcy, and the cost of the Supervision and Control of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, as the official Inspector of Trustees and Commissioners, and the Keeper of the Records.

In treating of the expenses in bankruptcy, the element of time, consumed in the process of winding up, is an important consideration.

The statistics of bankruptcy in Scotland, prior to the year 1856, are not readily available. In 1856, the Act* for the Amendment and Consolidation of the Law, which is now in operation, was passed. By that Act, the office of accountant in bankruptcy is constituted, and it is provided that the accountant shall keep a register of sequestrations, and make a return annually of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to the Court of Session. The period which has elapsed since the passing of the Act has not been sufficiently long to afford materials for extended observation connected with the statistics of bankruptcy. The writer has been able to gather, from the accountant's reports already issued, and from other sources of information at his disposal, some facts regarding the expenses, which may be useful and interesting to social economists and legal reformers. These facts may be arranged under the four heads into which, as before stated, the expenses in bankruptcy may be classed.

I.—THE COMMISSION OR REMUNERATION TO THE TRUSTEE.

In bankruptcies which are wound up by composition settlements, the remuneration to the trustee is a sum fixed by the commissioners, as compensation for his trouble and responsibility. It may be a commission, at a certain rate per cent., on the bankrupt's assets, but it is more commonly a sum allowed as compensation for the time and trouble of the trustee, without reference to the amount of the assets.

In one hundred and four estates, which were wound up by compositions in 1857, as reported, the average amount of the trustee's remuneration was £23 14s., or about 2½ per cent., if measured by the gross value of assets.

In eighty cases of composition settlements, in 1858, this remuneration averaged £43 8s. 2d., or about 2½ per cent., if measured by the gross assets.

Taking a general view of the results of the experience of the two years above stated, it may be fairly concluded that the average amount of the trustee's remuneration in sequestrations, wound up by compositions is (in round numbers) £33, or about 2½ per cent., if measured by the gross value of the assets.

In sequestrations, which are wound up by the recovery and distribution of the assets, the trustee's remuneration is a commission or percentage on the sums received by him.

In 1858 (which is the first year under the new Act, in which an appreciable number of sequestrations were wound up in this way), the trustee's commission averaged 5½ per cent. of the gross receipts.

In 1859 (when a large number of sequestrations were wound up by division of the assets), the average commission was slightly under 5 per cent. of the gross recoveries.

In looking into the details of the cases which give these average results (as reported in appendix) it will be found that in sequestrations in which the receipts amount only to £100, or thereby, the commission is sometimes even as high as 15 per cent.; and, in those in which the receipts amount to £200, or thereby, the commission is often 10 per cent. of the receipts. The assets in these cases are generally composed of small trade debts, and the commission on them, although at a very high rate per cent., is small in actual amount, and cannot be considered as too great remuneration to the trustees in these cases, considering the very great trouble involved in the recovery of small debts from an inferior class of debtors.

It may be safely concluded, from the experience of the year 1859, above stated, that the average rate of commission to trustees, in sequestrations wound up by division of assets, does not exceed 5 per cent.

II.—THE LAW CHARGES.

It is usual and proper to measure the trustees' commission by contrasting it with the amount of the assets recovered; because the commission bears a fixed relation to the amount of the receipts. This, however, is not the case as regards the law charges, which have no direct relation to the amount of the assets. It is indeed difficult to suggest a rule by which the average amount of law expenses in sequestrations can be fairly ascertained, so various are the circumstances of each case, as respects the extent of litigation, the duration of the sequestrations, and otherwise. All that the writer can hope

* This valuable paper, and another by Sheriff Glasford Bell, on the Bankruptcy Law of England and Scotland, have been published in a separate form. Glasgow: Mackintosh; London: Hamilton, Adams, & Co.

* Short title—"The Bankruptcy Scotland Act, 1856," 19 & 20 Vict. c. 79.

It appears that in 1858, when the estates which were divided were small in amount, the law charges averaged upwards of 13 per cent. of the receipts; and the average amount of these charges applicable to sequestrations so wound up was (in round numbers) £130. In 1859, when a number of larger estates were wound up by division, the law charges average rather less than 13 per cent. of the receipts; and the average amount of law charges so wound up was (in round numbers) £120.

The writer applied to the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire (the court which has the largest number of sequestrations) for a statement of the taxed amount of law charges applicable to sequestrations under the recent Act. By the favour of the Sheriff, he has obtained a statement of the amounts of law charges in 1858 and 1859, and seven sequestrations, £1,000 and upwards, in each year. The taxed amount of law charges in 1858 was £1,082 9s. 6d., the average for each of the seven sequestrations is, consequently, £157 12s. 6d., or thereby. The law charges so returned apply partly to sequestrations settled by composition and partly to those which have been wound up by division. The auditor, in his return states, "in the general case where the account is taken, the expenses of the law agent for a sequestration under the bankrupt Act, which is wound up, and in which the bankrupt obtains a discharge under a composition arrangement, carried through without opposition under the statute, may, on an average, be estimated at from £35 to £40." The writer is fully concurred in this opinion.

In these circumstances, it may be submitted, as a fair and reasonable conclusion, so far as experience under the new Act warrants a conclusion—1st, That the average amount of the law charges, in an ordinary sequestration, wound up by composition, does not exceed £40; and 2nd, that in an ordinary sequestration, wound up by division, it does not exceed £65.

III.—THE MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES.

These, as the name indicates, are of a very mixed character, and difficult to estimate. There are travelling charges, cost of valuations, expenses of advertising, postages, and incidents. These are ordinary charges incidental to sequestrations in general. They amount, so far as can be judged from past experience, to 3½ per cent., or thereby, of the receipts, from estates wound up by division.

In sequestrations settled by composition, the average of these expenses does not exceed £27 for each sequestration.

The extraordinary charges, which appear in some sequestrations, such as wages, and outlay for working up materials, completing contracts, &c., are more properly deductions from the receipts, than expenses applicable to the sequestration.

IV.—THE EXPENSES OF THE JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW OF BANKRUPTCY, AND THE COST OF THE SUPERVISION AND CONTROL OF THE ACCOUNTANT IN BANKRUPTCY.

The judicial administration of bankruptcy is conducted by the court, supreme (Court of Session) and inferior (Sheriff or County), along with the other judicial business of the country. The expense of the Scotch judicial establishment is, as is well known, a branch of the public expenditure; and this expense is not appreciably enlarged, in consequence of bankruptcy being involved in the jurisdiction of the judges. The estates of bankrupts are not specially charged, in any way, with the costs of the judicial establishment of the country.

The office of Accountant in Bankruptcy was established by the Act of 1856. Some misapprehension, regarding the duties of this office, is likely to arise from his official designation. The name suggests the idea that this officer is charged with the control and disposal of money; but he receives none of the moneys of the bankrupt estates. It also conveys the impression that the audit of accounts in bankruptcy constitutes part of the duties of the office; but, as has been already stated, the commissioners are the auditors of the accounts. The duties of the accountant are properly those of an inspector, charged with the supervision and control of both trustees and commissioners to ascertain that they discharge their duties, and, in case of their failure, to report the offenders to the Court for removal or censure. The creditors have easy access to this officer to present complaints, in cases of delinquency on the part of trustees or commissioners.

The whole expense of this office, including the accountant's salary (£850), salaries to three clerks (£150 each), cost of chambers, &c., is defrayed out of sums voted by Parliament. The amounts of the annual expenses of this office, for the four years of its existence, as taken from the Civil Service Estimates, are noted below.* The cost of the whole establishment may be stated to amount, in round numbers, to £1,500 a year. It may cost more to maintain this office on an efficient footing, as regards the services of clerks.

The expense of the accountant's office and establishment is the only charge connected with bankruptcy, which burdens the revenues of the country. The office is not in any way supported by fees—all parties interested are entitled to the services of the accountant and his clerks, in their official capacities, without charge. It is understood that this arrangement has worked well.

It has been already said that the time occupied in the process of winding-up is an important consideration in treating of the expenses in bankruptcy.

Sequestrations which are wound up by composition settlements, very rarely endure beyond a year. These settlements are generally concluded, and the sequestrations declared at an end, after the expiry of a few months from the award of sequestration. The number of sequestrations wound up in this summary way was, in 1857, ninety-seven; and, in 1858, one hundred and eighty-nine.

In sequestrations wound up by division of the funds, the average time occupied in the process of winding up (counting from the date of award of the sequestration to the discharge of the trustee), was, as regards the small number (twenty-three) of sequestrations so wound up, in 1858, rather less than one year (months 11·782); and, as regards the one hundred and twenty-three sequestrations so wound up in 1859, the average time was rather less than a year and a half (1·498 years).

To sum up what has been stated, regarding expenses in bankruptcy—

1st. The average expenses in an ordinary sequestration, wound up by composition settlement, may be stated thus:—

It appears from the experience of the years 1858 and 1859, as regards the sequestrations which have been wound up by division of funds during these years, that 25 per cent., or thereby, of the gross receipts has been required to defray the expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, attending these sequestrations; the remaining 75 per cent. having been divided amongst the creditors;† and that this 75 per cent. has been distributed, and the sequestrations wound up, within an average period of a year and a half from the commencement of the sequestrations.‡ In considering these results, it must be kept

‡ It appears from the accountant's report for 1858, that the average value of the estates sequestrated in 1857 was £1,300, or thereby. The average value of estates wound up by division of the assets, in 1858, was only £365, or thereby; and in 1859, £323 or thereby. These figures prove that the estates wound up during these years, and especially during the first year, were generally small in amount. The effect which the estates of larger amount (when they come into computation) will have in the way of reducing the average of the expenses is clearly shown by contrasting the results for the years 1858 and 1859. In the former of these years, when the whole of the estates then divided were small in amount, the average ordinary expenses amounted to 23 per cent. of the gross in view that the great majority of the estates which have hitherto been wound up, are comparatively of small amount, and that sufficient time has not elapsed, since the passing of the Act, to bring in the larger estates to operate upon the average.

3rd. So far as past experience warrants a conclusion, the ordinary expenses attending a sequestration wound up by division of the funds are, on an average:—Trustee's commission, 5 per cent. of the gross assets or receipts; Law charges, £65; and Miscellaneous ordinary charges, 3½ per cent. of the gross receipts. Applying these figures to an estate of the average value of £1,300 (which is the average amount of estates sequestrated in 1857), the following are the results:—

	Amount.	Rate per cent. of gross assets.
Trustee's commission...	£65 0 0	5

4th. The only charge connected with bankruptcy in Scotland, which burdens the revenues of the country, is the cost of the office of Accountant in Bankruptcy, which at present amounts (in round numbers) to £1,500 a year.

The writer in concluding this paper, may be permitted to submit some general observations, bearing upon the administration of bankruptcy.

1st. It is wisely provided by the law of this country that the creditors are invested in the estates of their bankrupt debtors, for the purposes of administration and distribution. The courts, the accountant, the trustee, and the commissioners, are, so to speak, aids to the creditors in the discharge of their functions. It is submitted that no system can be more simple in principle; and it appears from the results which the writer has deduced that this principle is carried out in practice at moderate expense to the creditors themselves, and with great economy as regards the public.

2nd. The power which is given to the creditors of electing a trustee (professional or non-professional, as seems to them best suited to promote their interests is valuable, as tending to economy and good management. The trustee elected by the creditors finds security (judicially) for his faithful accounting, and he is subject to judicial control. The creditors may remove him of their own accord, or they may have him removed by judicial authority, on cause shown.

3rd. The commissioners form a standing council to the trustee, which is readily constituted at small expense. The system of audit of the trustee's accounts by the commissioners is judicious. The creditors, as it were, devolve, on a small committee of their number, the duty of settling these accounts, subject, in case of question, to judicial supervision.

4th. It is a good and prudent arrangement by which the trustee is constituted the responsible employer of the law agent or solicitor, to transact the law business of the creditors connected with the sequestration. Divided responsibility in the selection of a law agent is thus avoided; and, if the trustee make an improper selection, the creditors themselves can correct the error by removing the trustee. The law agent's accounts are cheaply and expeditiously taxed, either by the auditor of the Court of Session, or by the auditor of the Sheriff (County) Court, to whichever of these auditors the creditors are pleased to refer the taxation. The expense of a separate taxing master in bankruptcy is thus avoided.

5th. The judicial administration of bankruptcy is conducted efficiently by the general courts of the country. There is thus no occasion for the expense of a peculiar jurisdiction in bankruptcy cases. Questions which originate before the trustee are readily and cheaply brought, either into the Sheriff (County) Courts, or into the Court of Session; and these questions (if appeals be competent) may be ultimately decided by the House of Lords as the court of last resort.

6th. The writer has great delicacy, in consequence of his position, in referring to the working of the newly-constituted office of accountant in bankruptcy. It seems useful that there should be a public inspector of trustees and commissioners, to provide that they perform their duties faithfully, and to receive and investigate the complaints of creditors in reference to the administration of the estates. It also seems a good arrangement that the accountant's office is used for the purpose of concentrating the records of bankruptcy, and thereby giving to the creditors and to the public convenient access to them, and to the statistics obtained from them. The ready access to this office which is afforded to the creditors in matters connected with the administration and management of bankrupt estates, has a tendency to check litigation in trifling cases.

7th. The great desideratum for perfecting the administration of bankruptcy is a watchful superintendence on the part of the creditors, who are the real owners of the bankrupt estates. Where the creditors superintend the proceedings watchfully, the estates are wound up speedily and economically; where they neglect their control, the proceedings become sluggish, imperfect, and expensive. No system of checks which can be established will compensate for the want of proper superintendence on the part of the creditors.

8th. It follows from what has been stated, that it is of great consequence to the beneficial working of the system, that the creditors should make a proper and judicious selection of commissioners. It not unfrequently occurs that commissioners are selected who, using the forcible language of the law of Scotland, are conjunct and confident with the trustee. They are subject to his influence, in business or otherwise, and thus not impartial administrators of the great trust which is reposed in them by the creditors. It would be an improvement if certain parties connected with the trustees—such as his partners, clerks, and servants—were declared incapable of acting as commissioners. The law agent in the sequestration should also be declared disqualified from acting as a commissioner. The creditors have the power of removing objectionable commissioners; but this power is rarely used, and it appears that it would promote purity and efficiency of management, if such interested parties were declared ineligible for the office of commissioners. The trouble of the commissioners is not remunerated at the expense of the estates. There is a general impression that unpaid services in matters of business are not so highly profitable as those which are suitably remunerated. It might be an improvement, if the commissioners were remunerated for their services at the expense of the estates. The amount of their remuneration might be fixed by the creditors themselves; or, in the option of the creditors, it might be referred to the auditor of the law business accounts, or to the accountant, with the power of appeal, as in the case of the trustee's commission.

9th. There is some risk of the expenses in bankruptcy being unduly increased, by trustees devolving on the law agents the performance of duties for which they (the trustees) are responsible, and for which they are paid. The process of winding up—which is conducted, not by the trustee himself, but under directions given by him to his law agent—is not only unnecessarily expensive, but also tedious and unsatisfactory. The trustee ought to be qualified to perform all the ordinary duties attending the administration and distribution of the estate, without reference to the law agent. The attention of the law agent, on the other hand, ought to be confined strictly to the law business, and to the conveyancing. Confusion in the discharge of the relative duties of the trustee and the law agent, where such prevails, ought to be corrected by the auditor who taxes the business accounts by disallowing charges in the law agent's account, for business which falls properly within the province of the trustee.

10th. Great benefit is likely to accrue from the publicity which has been given to the proceedings in bankruptcy since the Act of 1856 came into operation. Any abuses which arise in the administration of bankruptcy may now be reasonably expected to yield to the influence of enlightened public opinion. The publication of the statistics of bankruptcy is likely to have a beneficial effect on the parties who are professionally engaged in the administration of estates in bankruptcy, as well as upon the public mind. The consideration of these statistics may be expected to promote good, cheap, and expeditious management on the part of the trustees; and the public will obtain from them authentic data from which to judge of the economical advantages of the system of bankruptcy law which is in operation in this country.

Receipts. In 1859, when the estates divided were larger in amount, the average of the ordinary expenses came down to 17½ per cent. on the gross receipts. The writer is, therefore, fully warranted in expecting that the average expenses will be still further reduced, when the larger estates, which are now in the process of winding up, come to operate upon the average.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE IMPROVED ORGANIZATION OF THE PROFESSION.

The following paper was read by Mr. DANIEL JAMES MILLER, at the late meeting at Newcastle:—

It is hardly necessary to apologise for introducing to this Society considerations for further improving the tone, character, and social position of the profession.

Both this association and the Incorporated Law Society have in common this object, and much has been done to unite and organize the influence of attorneys, to promote professional improvement, and to facilitate the acquisition of legal knowledge. But no opportunity should be lost of agitating for further progress, ventilating suggestions, and seeking the best means of giving them practical application. The following suggestions are offered not without diffidence but with the anxious hope that even though they may not meet with approbation, they may at least be deemed worthy of consideration and discussion.

The present meeting, bringing together both the provincial and metropolitan members of the association, and in addition inviting the presence and support of the profession at large and their articulated clerks, is a great stride towards an extended organization including the whole profession in its basis.

To the Incorporated Law Society is due a large meed of praise; for this society was the pioneer in the attempt to bring together the public-spirited members of our body, and to give their efforts a coherence and solidity. That society also formed a nucleus round which this and other societies have gathered. With it the general body is identified, and by its exertions many and valuable benefits have been obtained. But the progress we have made leads us to look forward with confidence. We cannot conceal from ourselves that the Incorporated Society only enumerates amongst its members a portion of the profession, and that of these the larger number are taken from the metropolis. It is to be regretted that the organization of the society is so imperfect, and it is worthy of consideration whether the Incorporated Law Society could not be made to comprise every member of the profession, and whether the many societies into which the profession is divided, could not coalesce or combine as branches of the grand trunk or body. The advantages of such a combination would be great, nor would it be entirely without example; I may instance the bar, which is composed of the members of the various Inns of Court, and these societies have combined for the purpose of carrying out wise and enlightened educational reforms. The bar, it should be recollected, has always been a compact and self-governing body, and this to a great extent has given rise to the honour, and the public spirit, which as a general rule, actuate its members and command for that body the general respect.

Already the Incorporated Law Society are entrusted with the superintendence of the examination of articulated clerks, and the admission as an attorney might ipso facto include admission to the Incorporated Law Society, which then would indeed be the Society of Solicitors.

In the country the society might be formed into branches composed of members residing within the district, and the branch societies should select their own officer, of whom the chairman should ex officio be a member of the general council or governing body. The society and its branches might exercise supervision over the members, inquire into cases of malpractice, and hold periodical examinations of articulated clerks.

By means of the branch societies libraries might be collected in central positions and facilities afforded for the formation of debating societies, the delivery of lectures, and other modes of assisting the law students in the acquisition of legal knowledge and the improvement of their mental culture.

The present system of examination is open to the objection that it permits the student to be idle during the first part of his articles, which he seeks to repair by a spasmodic effort of study towards its close, giving a superficial knowledge hastily acquired, and nearly as soon lost, and at the same time creating a disgust for study hardly ever overcome afterwards.

The changes in society render more solid attainments necessary in the professional practitioner than formerly, a wider scope is required to be given to the reading, and habits of study should be inculcated. This would be best effected by a periodical examination which would spread the reading over a longer duration of time, and cause the acquisition of knowledge to be continual and gradual, and therefore more sound and lasting.

By the recently passed Act encouragement is given to educational and classical attainments by offering as a premium a shorter period of service to those who pass certain preliminary examinations of a high standard.

The periodical examinations which should be held both in the metropolis and by the country branches, would have a further beneficial effect by bringing together more frequently the students in the districts and the leading members of the profession, and encouraging in all a public spirit and generous emulation.

For the enquiry into cases of malpractice and the expurgation of offenders a committee of the council of the governing body both in the principal and branch societies might be created, assisted by a secretary or competent officer. By this officer complaints in the first instance might be investigated upon written statements, and on sufficient grounds appearing to the satisfaction of the committee the party complained of might be summoned to shew cause why he should not be suspended. The tribunal for this inquiry might be selected from the governing body of the central society by lot, and the sentence of suspension should have the effect of excluding the offender from the practice and the privileges of the profession, subject, however, to the review of the superior courts.

The meanest instruments may by a concurrence of circumstances bring a whole body into disgrace, and it seems only a fair and wise provision that a profession which by position is entrusted with interests requiring the highest integrity, should be the custodian of its own honour.

Such a privilege is already enjoyed by the bar, the church, and the military and naval services, and seems best calculated to create and preserve the honour it is its object to protect.

For the discussion and suggestion of amendments in the law and alterations in its procedure, the improved organization of the society and its division into branches and sections, with aggregate meetings from time to time at the principal towns and cities, will afford facilities and advantages unable by other means to be attained—the practical knowledge of the profession will be applied in the mode best calculated for the public welfare—its public spirit will be constantly evoked and a confidence will be engendered in the public mind in the energy, ability, and usefulness of the profession, which will tend more than any thing else to raise up and improve its tone, character, and social position.

Reviews.

A Compendium of the Law of Merchant Shipping; with an Appendix containing all the Statutes and forms of practical utility. By FREDERICK PHILIP MAUDE and CHARLES EDWARD POLLOCK, Esqs., of the Inner Temple, Barristers-at-Law. Second edition. London: H. Sweet. 1860.

We recently had occasion to notice the publication of a very admirable treatise on the Law of Merchant Shipping, and have now the pleasure of announcing another work not less interesting and able upon the same subject. The latter, although a second edition, is to all intents and purposes, a new treatise; inasmuch as the former edition was published prior to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, and several other important statutes relating to the same subject. The authors commence with a chapter on The Title to and National Character of Merchant Ships, and then proceed to discuss the liability of owners and part owners. The Master, the Crew, the Pilot, the Contract of Affreightment, Insurance, Hypothecation, Collision, Salvage, and Passengers, constitute the remaining general heads. It will thus be seen that the plan of the work is extremely natural and judicious, and we have no hesitation in saying that its execution throughout is all that could be desired. The effect of the authorities is stated generally with scrupulous precision, and at the same time with accuracy; while the authors have exhibited great diligence in collecting the reported cases, both ancient and modern. We have looked for omissions of this kind where they are most likely to occur, and have been unable to find any. The only fault that we can suggest is one which this book has in common with the majority of law books of modern times—nearly one-third of it is composed of Acts of Parliament. There is, however, as much of the same matter in Mr. MacLachlan's "Law of Merchant Shipping;" and if any other book happens to be forthcoming upon this subject, we shall no doubt have over again the Act of 1854, and other Acts relating to shipping, in extenso. Thus, a library which happens to have any two of these volumes, and to take in the general public statutes as well, will possess three copies of all these voluminous Acts; and as changes take place in our statutes, especially in the event of any general consolidation, these text-books are doomed to be bound up with so much dead matter, which would be well enough amongst the general body of statutes, but are a mere incumbrance to a treatise. We make these observations, not because they have any peculiar application to the work now before us, but on account of the general prevalence amongst legal authors now-a-days, of the objectionable practice to which we have referred.

As to the proper text of the Compendium of Messrs. Mando & Pollock, we can speak only in terms of high commendation both of the industry and the learning of the authors.

The following extract is a fair specimen of the authors' style. We omit the notes which, however, contain a considerable body of law of a character supplementary to that discussed in the text. The passage relates to the important question as to the vesting of the property in ships while building:—

"Questions of considerable nicety often arise as to the time when the property in vessels which are building vests in the person for whom they are being built. The determination of this point must depend upon the intention of the parties, as evidenced by the particular terms of the contract under which the vessel is built. In the ordinary case of a contract to build a ship, the subject matter of the contract not being in existence, the vendee acquires no property in it until it is finished, and actually or constructively delivered. But where, by the terms of the contract, a superintendent is employed by the vendee to overlook the building, and the price is to be paid by instalments, which are regulated by particular stages in the progress of the work, so that the vendee may be said to appropriate the different portions of the ship as they are from time to time completed, the property in those portions vests in the purchaser as soon as each instalment is paid. The mere fact of the ship being one-third built at the time of the making of the contract has been held not to have this effect. In all these cases the question is one of fact rather than of law; namely, what was the intention of the parties as evidenced by their contract and the surrounding circumstances. In two recent decisions a distinction was drawn, based upon the facts of the cases and nature of the contracts, between the ship herself and materials which, although selected and prepared, had never been actually attached to her; it was held that the latter did not vest in the vendee, although the former did."

The Practice of the Sheriffs' Court of the City of London, with Forms of the Proceedings to be used by Suitors, and an Appendix of the Statutes, and Rules, and Orders of the Court. By O. B. C. HARRISON, M.A., Barrister-at-Law, of the Inner Temple. Sweet, 1860.

It is now many years since any book especially dedicated to the elucidation of the jurisdiction and practice of the Sheriffs' Court of the City of London has been published. We believe that Mr. Lewis's Practice, which appeared in 1833, is the most recent upon the subject; and, as both the jurisdiction and procedure of the court have undergone great changes during the interval that has since elapsed, the want of a guide has been the occasion of much inconvenience to the profession and the public. It is for the purpose of supplying this want that the present work has been prepared. Its introduction, which contains a summary of the origin and history of the court, informs us that it is a court of record by virtue of its ancient common law jurisdiction, which formerly extended to all personal actions without limitation as to amount; and that although its principal jurisdiction in the present day is confined by statute to personal actions for amounts not exceeding £50, it still possesses, as an ancient court of record, attributes not attached to the ordinary county courts; as, for instance, the power to try actions under writs of trial. The court sits as a common law court for the trial of actions under these writs, and the proceedings at the trial in such cases are in conformity with the ordinary proceedings at Nisi Prius, and being altogether independent of the prescribed proceedings of the Statutory court. But the principal jurisdiction of the court is that which it derives from the London (City) Small Debts Act, passed in 1852; which, though differing in many important particulars from the county courts Acts in force when it was passed, is framed upon the model of those Acts; and within the last twelve months, rules of practice resembling, but not identical with, those relating to the county courts, have been framed for the regulation of the proceedings under this Act. It is competent to the court held under the statute to try personal actions, with a few exceptions, for any amount, if the parties agree; and without agreement, to the extent of £50. If a part only of a cause of action arises within the City, a summons may issue; and actions for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment, which are excepted from the jurisdiction of the county courts, may be tried in the Sheriffs' Court. The court also possesses jurisdiction under the Friendly Societies Acts, and Metropolitan Building Act of 1855.

The proceedings are by plaint and summons as in the county courts without pleadings; but we observe that the 72nd rule (at page 72 of the work), though not expressly naming the proceeding to which it relates as a pleading, seems calculated to introduce a system of proceeding into the Court which must be more or less attended with the inconveniences which the virtual prohibition in the statute against pleas was intended to prevent.

Mr. O. B. C. Harrison's work is divided into three parts. The first comprises the proceedings in actions under writs of trial. The second treats of the ordinary jurisdiction under the statute, and explains the proceedings of the Court from the entry of the plaint down to execution; and in the case of new trials, appeals and arbitrations. The third explains the jurisdiction and practice under the Friendly Societies Acts, and some other statutes by which the Court has acquired an addition to its ordinary functions. It may be added that whatever matter is introduced in the second part by way of illustration only is confined to the notes; and that the text is devoted exclusively to the statute and rules of practice.

Before the appearance of this book works on county court practice were generally resorted to as guides to the Sheriff's Court; but it is obvious, from what has been premised above, that such guides were neither convenient nor to be relied on for directing the proceedings in a court regulated by a distinct Act of Parliament, and differing in many respects from the county courts in point of both jurisdiction and practice. Mr. Harrison has long been known to our readers as one of the gentlemen who report for the Weekly Reporter, in the common law courts; and for some time past he has had no little practice in the Sheriff's Court. He is therefore peculiarly qualified to write such a treatise; and we can recommend it as being the careful production of a competent man.

The Social Science Almanack and Handbook for the year 1861. London: Tweedie.

This almanack will be found useful to the legal profession, and the public generally. It contains no little information upon some important subjects which were discussed by the Association for the Promotion of Social Science during the past year.

EXAMINATION FOR THE BAR.

HILARY TERM, 1861.

The Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the public examination of students for the bar:—

An examination will be held in next Hilary Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship or honour, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the bar, will be admissible. Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs, on or before Tuesday, the 1st day of January next, and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction; or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the bar. The examination will commence on Tuesday, the 8th of January next, and will be continued on the Wednesday and Thursday following. It will take place in the Benchers' Reading Room of Lincoln's Inn; and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Tuesday Morning, the 8th January, at half-past nine, on constitutional law and legal history; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on equity.

Wednesday morning, the 9th January, at half-past nine, on common law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the law of real property, &c.

Thursday morning, the 10th January, at half-past nine, on jurisprudence and the civil law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Thursday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary according as the student is a candidate for honours or a studentship, or desires simply to obtain a certificate.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned; regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations, until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship, but only at one of the three examinations immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate; provided, that if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship.

ENDORSEMENT OF CHECKS BY PROCURATION.

A communication which appeared in the columns of the "Times" a short time since, explains the legal position of the endorsed check question.

The writer after stating that the responsibility of bankers in the payment of checks endorsed "per procuration," was a matter of much importance to the mercantile community, and requesting to be allowed to state the actual position of a question with the history of which he happened to be personally conversant, proceeded as follows:—

"When in 1853, it was proposed to impose a stamp of 1d. on checks payable to order, of whatever amount, it became obvious to the Governors of the Bank of England, and to the eminent private bankers with whom they conferred, that the extensive use of such checks, and the absolute impossibility of bankers ascertaining the genuineness of the endorsements inscribed on them, precluded their adoption as a banking expedient unless bankers were protected from all obligation to consider the authenticity of the endorsements. To carry out this protection the 19th section was inserted in the Act 16th & 17th of Victoria, cap. 59.

"In the case of Cookson v. the Bank of England, a check drawn upon the Bank of England by Freeman and Co., payable to the order of Cuthbert Cookson and Co., was presented with the endorsement, 'Per procuration, Cookson and Co., A. Holme, agent,' and was paid by the cashiers of the bank.

"Holme, it was affirmed by Cooksons, had no authority to sign for them, and had absconded, having applied the moneys to his own use, and they thereupon demanded from the bank payment for the second time of the amount of the check, 655l. 12s. 10d.

"The bank refused to pay a second time; and the suit came on for trial before Mr. Baron Martin and a special jury, at Guildhall, on the 29th of June.

"At the opening of the trial Mr. Bovill, for the bank, having stated the chief features of the case, called the attention of the learned judge to the 19th section of the Act 16th & 17th of Victoria, cap. 59, which runs thus:—

"Provided always, that any draught or order drawn upon a banker for a sum of money payable to order on demand which shall, when presented for payment, purport to be endorsed by the person to whom the same shall be drawn payable, shall be a sufficient authority to such banker to pay the amount of such draught or order to the bearer thereof; and it shall not be incumbent on such banker to prove that such endorsement or any subsequent endorsement was made by or under the direction or authority of the person to whom the said draught or order was or is made payable, either by the drawer or any endorser thereof."

"And Mr. Bovill then submitted to his lordship that the intention of the clause was to protect the banker against liability arising from endorsements of any kind on checks to order; that the invariable practice of bankers since the passing of the Act had placed that construction upon its meaning; and that the plaintiff should be nonsuited.

"Mr. Manisty (for Cookson and Co.) contended that the 19th clause was only intended to protect the banker when checks were presented bearing the name of the payee, and that it was not intended to relieve the banker from asking to see the authority under which a check was endorsed 'per procuration,' the very terms of such an endorsement declaring that it purports to be endorsed, not by the payee, but by a person who says, 'I sign by authority of the payee.'

"Mr. Baron Martin remarked:—'I should think the Legislature must be understood to enact according to the known ordinary practice, and every person knows it is a common thing to take a bill of exchange endorsed 'per procuration.' Nothing is more common. Any person who is in the habit of seeing them must see thousands, and the Legislature must be taken to enact according to the common course of business.

"I am of opinion that the 19th section of the 16th & 17th of Victoria, cap. 59, protects the defendants."

"The jury were then called, charged by the learned judge, and the plaintiff was nonsuited, Mr. Manisty asking leave to have an appeal, which was granted as a matter of course.

"The appeal, which should have come on for decision in November, has not been prosecuted, and the unhesitating decision of Baron Martin remains unimpeached, to confirm the interpretation which had been placed upon the 19th section of the Stamp Act of 1853, by the concurrent opinions of the Bank authorities and of the private London bankers, and I may add with certainty, having been personally concerned in its preparation, that this interpretation, now judicially affixed to the protecting section of the Act, only effects what was intended by its promoters. This satisfactory decision is after all a source of congratulation rather to the public than to the bankers as a class. A decision adverse to the Bank would have involved a general refusal by bankers to pay any check to order endorsed by procuration—they would have been uninjured, but the public would have lost a portion of the banking facilities which the Act contemplated.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Lord Chancellor, in a judgment on Thursday last, took occasion to observe upon the importance of judges delivering written instead of oral judgments, in cases where complications, either of facts or law, give rise to any risk of misunderstanding by the parties to whom the judgment is delivered. In the case on appeal before his lordship, the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor occupied forty quarto pages closely printed. Alluding to this fact, his lordship thus expressed himself:—"I should have disposed of the appeal, not only with less labour to myself, but more satisfactorily and more confidently, had the judgment been more condensed. My attention has been diverted from the main questions in the case by elaborate and minute disquisitions as to the bearing of contradictory evidence on subordinate points, and by following the devious paths by which the final conclusion is at last reached. Judgments of such prodigious length, instead of settling, have a tendency to unsettle the law; and, instead of sending the defeated party away contented, I can say by experience since I have presided in this court, that they rather generate appeals: for, although the decree be right, some of the various reasons given for it may be questionable, and a false hope excited that, impugning these, the decree may be reversed. The verdicts of juries are generally acquiesced in, perhaps because they are given without reasons. An equity judge, who has to determine questions of fact, cannot follow this course; but there is no necessity for his stating from his tribunal all that passed through his mind during his deliberations, with all his doubts and his wanderings. I will further venture to declare my hearty concurrence in the opinion frequently expressed by one of the most distinguished of my predecessors, Lord Chancellor Brougham, that when, on account of the importance and difficulty of a case, judges, after having heard it argued at the bar, take time to consider, they will do well by delivering a written judgment. The judgments even of Lord Eldon would have been still more valuable had he adopted this practice, imitating the example of that illustrious judge, his brother, Lord Stowell, who, by his written judgments, has composed a code of international maritime law admired and respected by all civilized nations."

There is a very general feeling, not only in the profession but among suitors, in accordance with what the Lord Chancellor has so well expressed; and his lordship has himself furnished a very remarkable illustration of the possibility of accomplishing what is in itself so desirable. Since the long vacation, Lord Campbell has heard and disposed of an unusually large number of appeals, some of them involving complicated issues of fact and difficult questions of law, and in nearly every case has delivered a written judgment within a week or two after the appeal was argued. As all these judgments are written by his lordship proprio manu, and some of them necessarily involve a great deal of irksome and sedentary manual labour, the wonder is how any judge, who is compelled to sit day by day hearing cases, can have sufficient time and energy for what the Lord Chancellor has been doing since he gained the woolsack. What the Vice-Chancellor Wood said on this subject last year at Bradford, will be in the memory of many of our readers. That learned and laborious judge there expressed a horror—in which most lawyers can sympathize with him—at the mechanical labour of much writing. The number of men who are physically capable of habitually of an evening filling a quire of paper with the results of an anxious consideration of arguments which they spent the day in hearing, is extremely small—perhaps not one in a thousand. It would be almost as reasonable to expect that a prima donna, who has in the evening to sustain the weight of an opera, should be prepared, as a rule, to teach in the morning in Mr. Hullah's school; or that one of Astley's acrobats should be always competent to discharge the duties of a night watchman. There are certain bounds to the physical powers of man, although they appear to constitute one of the few subjects with which Lord Campbell is not well acquainted. It would be out of all reason, as a rule, from a Vice-Chancellor, to look for written judgments, except in such cases as those alluded to by the Lord Chancellor. In those, however, it is almost as unreasonable to expect that suitors can be satisfied without the accurate consideration of their cases which is implied in written compositions. It is worthy of remark that in France and other continental countries all important judgments are delivered in writing; and we believe the same rule is invariably observed in Scotland.

From all parts of the country, but especially from the north, complaints are made of the comparative impunity of crime, which arises from the inadequate remuneration of witnesses for the prosecution. We published, at the time, the important memorial upon this subject of the Liverpool grand jury, who stated, that in the course of their experience, they had found a decided disinclination to assist in the prosecution of offenders, inasmuch as not only personal inconvenience but pecuniary loss is generally the fate of prosecutors under the new scale of allowances. Only two or three weeks ago a similar complaint was made to the magistrates of the Surrey sessions, not by the grand jury, but by a poor man, who, at the risk of his life, apprehended a violent thief, whom he afterwards prosecuted to conviction. The least that such a prosecutor might expect, would be that he should not be called upon to suffer the loss of money at the hands of the state, in addition to the violence to which he was exposed at the hands of the criminal. In our present number will be found a copy of another memorial on the same subject, from the grand jury of the county of York, at the winter assizes. The Government are now, at all events, in possession of abundant evidence to show that unless—as was observed by the Liverpool grand jurors—"a more equitable system be adopted for the payment of witnesses in criminal cases, the criminal law will become practically a failure." The mistake of the present scheme appears to be the uniformity of the scale of allowances for the entire kingdom, and also the want of sufficient classification, for the purpose of payment of witnesses. On this point the Liverpool grand jurors well remark upon the impolicy of a scale which does not enable the payment of any witnesses at a higher rate than the wages of an unskilled labourer—except in the case of the two professions of law and medicine.

We have just received a copy of an important Act passed by the Parliament of South Australia, and which received the royal assent two months ago. It is entitled "An Act to Consolidate and Amend certain Acts relating to the Transfer and Encumbrance of Freehold and other Interests in Land," and is intended to be a consolidation of the entire law of real property in that province. We have already given some account of what has been done there under former statutes, in the way of facilitating the transfer of land by means of a system of registration; and we have now before us the last report of Mr. Torrens, the registrar-general, which explains not only the principles of the South Australian scheme, but also its machinery and details. It further gives an account of the progress and working of the system; and suggests certain amendments of the law which experience has shown to be necessary—for the purpose of having them embodied in the Act to which we have referred, while it was under the consideration of the provincial parliament. We are aware, of course, that considerable differences of opinion exist as to the feasibility in this country of any system of registration—whether of title or of assurances—and also as to the effect upon the profession of the introduction amongst us of any such mode of land transfer. But it is obviously desirable that all parties should be in possession of whatever important facts relate to this interesting subject; and it is impossible to regard without interest the bold experiment which is now being made in Australia, although it would be absurd to leave out of consideration the very different circumstances of the two countries in respect of conveyancing. We shall content ourselves with taking an early opportunity of placing before our readers, for their information, a sketch of the Australian Act, and of Mr. Torrens' report.

We are glad to find the number of Law Societies gradually increasing throughout the country. Within a few days a promising Society has been established at Leicester, which appears to have taken for its model the Liverpool Law Society. Provincial Societies have it in their power to accomplish, or to aid in the accomplishment of much good, both to the profession and the public, by bringing the experience of local practitioners to bear upon the moot questions of the day. In this respect, as might have been expected, the Liverpool and Manchester Societies have led the way in the provinces, and by their reports from time to time have done good service. Societies in smaller provincial towns, therefore, can hardly do better than imitate models like these.

Entering upon the time-honoured season of kindness and liberality, when instinctively every Englishman likes to turn towards some benevolent channel where he can bestow a Christmas donation, we think it not an unfitting time to call the attention of the profession to the claims of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association—an institution with whose valuable objects we presume our readers are by this time familiar. By an advertisement in our columns this day we notice that there are nearly one thousand members of the profession already enrolled in the society, and that the invested capital amounts to £4,277.

We can only say that with the undoubted claims upon the sympathy and support of the profession as a body, which the institution possesses, we sincerely hope to find that, with the commencement of the new year, those figures will be very considerably augmented if not doubled.

It is rumoured that Mr. Phinn, Q.C., has been appointed Chief Justice of Madras, in the place of Sir Henry Davison, lately deceased. The salary is said to be seven thousand pounds a-year.

Parliament has been further prorogued to the 5th day of February next, on which day it is to assemble for the despatch of business.

IS THE HOUSE OF LORDS BOUND BY ITS OWN DECISIONS?

In our last number we discussed the question how far a court is bound by the decision of another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction; and we there suggested the general rule to be, that co-ordinate courts bound one another authoritatively by their decisions; and that exceptions from the rule were admissible only when the previous decision was manifestly grounded in mistake, or could not be followed without leading to some manifest absurdity or repugnancy. In the course of the discussion we were incidentally led to the further question, how far a court itself is bound by its own previous decisions. This question, again, appears under different aspects, according as the court is engaged on a final decision, or on one which admits of an appeal to a higher tribunal. Do these circumstances at all vary the problem, and lead to different conclusions? We propose, on the present occasion, to examine briefly these questions, and chiefly as to their practical bearing in our superior courts, whose judgments are subject to revision in a court of appeal, and in our courts of final appeal, as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the House of Lords.

Both these questions seem to lie within the province of what is called judicial discretion, that is to say, the courts have power to dissent from their own decisions, but are bound in duty to exercise it according to the established rules of sound legal discretion; and the true question at present appears to be, have any rules of discretion been laid down upon the matter with such authority and precision as to amount to law, and exclude an arbitrary judgment? When we turn to examine the practice of the courts, and to inquire the opinions of the learned judges, as the only safe sources from which such rules may be deduced, we are at once struck with the dearth, or rather complete absence, of any trace of definite doctrine upon the subject, until quite recent times; and we might not unreasonably infer from this circumstance that the importance of the question is of recent growth, and that the progressive settlement of the law relating to the general jurisdiction and practice of the judicature has only recently brought this question to light, and revealed the necessity for a reasonable solution. The fact, however, seems unquestionable, that notwithstanding much discussion has recently prevailed, very little progress has yet been made towards a final settlement, and very slender materials provided for a certain conclusion.

If we examine the theory upon which our courts of justice are constituted, and the objects which they are ordained to satisfy, amongst which the most prominent is the accurate and authoritative exposition of the law of the land, we should be inclined to maintain that one of the necessary consequences of the right fulfilment of their functions would be, that the decisions delivered at one time as declaratory of the law, should be binding upon them at any future time in pari materia, and should be open to review only by the constitutional process, where possible, of an appeal to a higher court. When, however, we extend our considerations to the practical infirmities to which courts in common with all human institutions are subject, and their liability to deception or mistake or inadvertence, we should be inclined to say that where from any cause they had failed to exercise a deliberate judgment on the point decided, they should not be excluded from their proper function of deliberation, whenever the same point on a future occasion arises before them. To admit the principle of replacing one deliberate judgment by another deliberate judgment of precisely the same value and authority, would tend to no advantage to the public, though the substitution might satisfy the logical qualms of the individual members of the Court, while it would certainly introduce great uncertainty in the law, and expose every judgment to doubt and impeachment. Human infirmity may be objected equally to every decision, and seems to require that a deliberate judgment should not be reviewed except by the submission of it to another judgment less liable to infirmity. On the other hand, to maintain that a court is bound by a doctrine which has been decided only in form, without any deliberation being properly exercised upon it, certainly sounds harsh and repulsive to reason and common sense.

The practice of our courts on these points, we have already had occasion to remark, is very obscure, and the language of the judges is very scanty; but so far as we can judge from such imperfect and inconclusive materials, we venture to think that the prevailing opinion is in accordance with the suggestions contained in the above observations. We find it frequently asserted that a court has the right, meaning thereby that on certain occasions a court can properly and wisely exercise a right, to review its own decision. We endeavoured to show in our recent article that though a court is in general bound by the deliberate judgment of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction it will certainly review such decision where it has manifestly issued improvidently, and under the influence of mistake or misinformation, or where it leads in its consequences to palpable absurdity or contradiction; and it seems impossible to deny to a court the same discretion in reviewing its own decisions which is accorded to it in respect of the decisions of co-ordinate courts, seeing that if any liberty of the kind is admitted at all, a court would probably treat its own decisions with less deference and respect than those of co-ordinate courts, and would at least be perfectly imbued with a consciousness of the motives and considerations which formerly called forth the decision, and which now constitute the ground for its recall.

It happens that some of our courts have been invested with a jurisdiction of final appeal in certain matters, while in other matters they exercise a jurisdiction which may be appealed against. For instance, the ordinary jurisdiction of the superior courts of common law is subject to appeal, but their jurisdiction on appeals from the county courts is final; so also the Court of Queen's Bench decides finally upon appeals from quarter sessions, and from magistrates; and the Court of Common Pleas decides finally on appeals from the decisions of the revising barristers. A court thus deciding on final appeal, it is said, has a special privilege of reviewing the decisions of co-ordinate courts, or its own decisions which have been delivered in its non-appellate capacity. Thus in Taylor v. Burgess, (5 H. & N. 1), Pollock, C. B. expressed the following opinion:—"When a case can be taken to a court of error, the decision of one court of co-ordinate jurisdiction ought to be binding on the others. Where, however, there is no means of appealing to a court of error, there is not the same obligation to follow the decision of another court; and accordingly we sometimes find courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction differing from each other." In R. v. Broudhempton, (5 Jur. N. S. 267,) an appeal from Quarter Sessions to the Queen's Bench, a decision of that Court (R. v. East Stonehouse) being cited, Lord Campbell, C. J., said:—"If I thought that decision wrong I should not hesitate to overrule it, because the case could not be carried to a higher tribunal." The distinction here pointed out seems free from objection, at least to the extent above defined. It would be idle to give an appeal to a Court without investing it with any power of reviewing the expositions of law upon which the judgments appealed against are founded. If, however, this exceptional privilege of the Court to review its own decisions be extended to those which it has previously delivered in its final appellate character, as suggested by the case in which the dictum of Lord Campbell occurs—for the judgment there submitted to review was of that character—it opens the whole question with respect to courts of final appeal, and we shall presently show that on more recent and more solemn occasions his Lordship has repeatedly expressed a contrary opinion.

The latter question, namely, how far a court of final appeal is bound by its own previous decision, arises more especially with reference to the conclusive effect of decisions in the Privy Council and the House of Lords—our highest courts of appeal; and we have fortunately more ample materials for examining into the state of the question with respect to these tribunals. In the first place, we may make the observation, and it is not an unimportant one, that although much discussion has been lately excited about this question, no instance has been cited in which either of these tribunals has reviewed a former deliberate decision, or at all committed itself to the doctrine that it was free to do so. The case of Keilley v. Carson (4 M. P. C. C. 63) is sometimes cited as an instance where the Privy Council decided contrary to an opinion which it had previously expressed in the case of Beaumont v. Barrett (1 M. P. C. C. 58) but the question as to the liberty of the Court in dealing with a former decision was not touched upon further than that Parke, B., who delivered the judgment in both cases, carefully avoided any conclusion with respect to it by saying in the latter judgment, "the opinion (in Beaumont v. Barrett) delivered by myself, immediately after the argument was closed, was not the only ground on which that judgment was rested, and therefore was in some degree extra-judicial; but besides, it was stated to be and was founded entirely on a dictum of Lord Ellenborough, which we all think cannot be taken as an authority for the abstract proposition." On the other hand, instances may be cited where the House of Lords and Privy Council have followed their own decisions, notwithstanding the strongest opinions expressed both in and out of the court against them. Take for example the case of Fletcher v. Soudes (1 Bligh. N. S. 144), on resignation bonds. Respecting these bonds it was said by one of the learned judges in that case: "But for the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of The Bishop of London v. Ffytche, I will venture to say that there never was a lawyer from the times when tithes were first granted to the present who would not without hesitation have said they were not void either by the statute or the common law." Nevertheless the Lord Chancellor Eldon moved the judgment of the House in the following language: "Addressing your lordships as one of the courts of justice, and not as a legislative body, it is my duty not to argue or state this case now on any other grounds than grounds of law. If the state of the law upon this subject is such that your lordships, looking at it as legislators, deem it fit that an Act should be passed to relieve against the law, that consideration ought not to affect, and therefore cannot affect, your lordships' decisions as judges. Before the decision in the Bishop of London v. Ffytche this bond might have been held to be legal. But I have no difficulty in saying that after this house has declared and decided, as it did in the case of the Bishop of London v. Ffytche, I conceive myself bound to apply the principles of that decision to this case. Your lordships are bound by that decision, unless there be some special circumstances to take this case out of the principle of that." The language of Chief Baron Alexander, addressed to the House of Lords in that case, is also well worthy of citation: "To what source are we to look for what is called the unwritten law of the land, if not to the decisions of the supreme judicature; and upon what principle are you to expect that your decisions shall bind your posterity in the times that are to come, if you yourselves are not bound by what your predecessors have done in the times that are past? I take, therefore, the rules that necessarily flow from that decision to be fixed and settled."

This question was very pointedly commented on by the members of the House of Lords in Bright v. Hutton, (3 H. L. C. 341). Lord St. Leonards, L.C., stated his opinion to the House: "That although you are bound by your own decisions as much as any court would be bound, so that you could not reverse your own decision in any particular case, yet you are not bound by any rule of law which you may lay down if, upon a subsequent occasion, you should find reason to differ from that rule, that is, that this House, like every court of justice, possesses an inherent power to correct an error into which it may have fallen." This opinion called forth the following strong remarks from Lord Campbell: "According to the impression upon my mind, a decision of this high court, in point of law, is conclusive upon the House itself, as well as upon all inferior tribunals. I consider it the constitutional mode in which the law is declared, and that after such a judgment has been pronounced, it can only be altered by an act of the Legislature. My opinion is that this House cannot decide something as law to-day, and decide differently the same thing as law to-morrow, because that would leave the inferior tribunals and the rights of the Queen's subjects in a state of uncertainty, and after there has been a solemn judgment of this House, laying down any position as law, I apprehend that that is binding upon the rights and liabilities of the Queen's subjects until it is altered by an Act of the Commons, the Lords, and the Sovereign on the throne." In the case of Wilson v. Wilson (5 H. L. C. 40), Lord St. Leonards reasserted his opinion, but in rather modified terms: "I certainly hold," said he, "that this House has the same power that every other judicial tribunal has to correct an error in subsequently applying the law to other cases." Lord Brougham, on that occasion, pronounced it to be a questio vexata, "how far we may or may not disregard one of our own judgments when applied to another cause?" In Hodgson v. De Beauchesne (42 M. P. C. C. 307), we find Mr. Pemberton Leigh suggesting the same question, and the only reply made was by a reference to the above dicta. Lastly, we have the very recent case of the Attorney-General v. Dean of Windsor (8 W. R. 477), in which Lord Campbell, as Lord Chancellor, repeated his former opinion in the following unmistakeable terms: "In our judicial capacity, we sit here to declare the law, and to administer it as it has been settled by prior decisions of this House. The present Master of the Rolls points out a decision of this House, which he says he thinks clearly governs the present case, adding (according to the Report, 24 Beav. 715), 'The decisions of the House of Lords are binding on me, and upon all courts, except itself.' I feel it my duty to say that I think this expression is incorrect. By the constitution of this United Kingdom, the House of Lords is the court of appeal in the last resort, and its decisions are authoritative and conclusive declarations of the existing state of the law, and are binding upon itself, when sitting judicially, as much as upon all inferior tribunals. The observations made by members of the House, whether law members or lay members, beyond the ratio decidendi which is propounded and acted upon in giving judgment, although they may be entitled to respect, are only to be followed in as far as they may be considered agreeable to sound reason and to prior authorities. But the doctrine on which the judgment of the House is founded must be universally taken for law, and can only be altered by Act of Parliament."

We venture to think that Lord Campbell, on the above occasions, has laid down the general rule correctly, and in accordance with traditional opinion; and that exceptions, if any, should be admitted only upon the most urgent and pressing necessity. To allow the decisions of our supreme courts of appeal to be lightly dealt with, would throw a shadow of uncertainty over the whole of the law. A practice of questioning and departing from their previous decisions would, we say it emphatically, raise the House of Lords above the law, and enable it to alter and enact, instead of to declare and obey.

CHANCERY STATISTICS FOR 1859.

The value of judicial statistics is most clearly perceived in regard to those courts in which questions of law greatly pre-

ponderate in number and weight over questions of fact. Issues of fact have a certain inherent life and vigour, and will not brook delay; but questions of law, intended to determine finally the rights of numerous parties not necessarily interested personally in the proceedings, have a languor peculiarly their own. Thus, while the old system of equity procedure prevailed, the immediate and effectual redress of an injury depended on its nature. If it were a legal right, justice was almost as prompt as it is now, but if it were equitable, the lawsuit threatened to become a damnosa hereditas to at least one generation of the posterity of the litigants. This failure of justice would not, perhaps, have occurred, if statistics prevailed in those days. Men would be startled by an array of facts, showing that expedition was a prize, which only one case in a hundred enjoyed in the court of chancery. We cannot now, indeed, complain of anything like this degree of sloth in the court of chancery, and its statistics are to be referred to chiefly to direct us in the solution of other questions besides that of delay. A Law and Equity Bill, a comprehensive reform of procedure, a cheap and effective system of taking evidence, the best stage of a suit for the summoning of a jury, the depriving judges of a discretion to remit issues of fact to courts of law, an effective and expeditious system of procedure on appeals—these and the like questions are the main topics of investigation which at present seek the light of judicial statistics, and which can be tested and determined by no other method that is equally satisfactory. It is curious that the dispute between Lord Bacon and Lord Coke has been transmitted, though not in its original virulence, down to the present time. The common law commissioners advocate a fusion of law and equity; while the equity judges, on the other hand, recommend not, indeed, a pre-eminence, as Lord Bacon did, but a continuance of the present isolation of the equity jurisdiction. It is not for us to endeavour, at least at present, "tantas componere lites." We do not intend in this paper to take either side in this discussion, nor is it necessary that we should do so. In Ireland it would appear that the experiment might best be made, as counsel generally practise in both classes of courts indifferently; and juries in equity have for some time been not uncommon there; while the division of learned labour in London presents a practical check to an immediate fusion that cannot be disregarded. Perhaps a gradual fusion by increasing still further the equitable powers of the common law judges, and a comparison of the comparative preference shown to the two classes of tribunals, as indicated by statistics, may best determine this question, which does not appear likely to lose its interest with the public. The concentration of the courts would, in addition to the other advantages of the change, help us to a solution of the problem. The great preponderance of questions of law and of documentary evidence that prevails in the class of equitable causes will, we think, always show, that, while there ought to be no necessary and binding distinction between the two jurisdictions, yet even if the systems be fused by Act of Parliament, a spontaneous division of labour ought to ensue; some of the judges confining their attention to questions of law, the others to issues of fact. For the tempest of Nisi Prius is certainly not calculated to induce that calm of mind necessary to a judge who is about to determine intricate legal rights. Even if a completely concurrent jurisdiction were imparted to both classes of courts at once, the statistics would soon cause the evil, if any, to be checked; as they would indicate the extent to which suitors, the best judges of the reform, availed themselves of it. Such a change would, we think, suggest a practical, and perhaps a statutory division of judicial labour, on a principle such as we have stated, which would be different from that founded upon the different nature of the rights sought to be enforced. There would be a division of the cases into those of law and fact; and not into those of a legal and an equitable nature. The niceties of ejectionment would be determined by the same judges that were daily discussing the involutions of constructive notice, while all cases of disputed facts would be determined by a different tribunal. This legal St. Simonism appears at first sight somewhat utopian, but it is the point to which all existing projects of law reform converge. Statistics, however, will render all speculations based on them more or less stable, and, as valuable facts, they cannot be cast overboard, even by those who most highly prize expedition, either in the working of the law, or in the accomplishment of their own cherished suggestions of reform.

The statistics of the Court of Chancery are stated by the report to be now for the first time issued with the present "comprehensive arrangement and detail." The returns were made by the chief officers of the several departments of the court. The chief clerks' returns comprise the proceedings which originated in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls and the vice-chancellors, the orders made thereon, the amount of debts claimed and adjudicated upon, the accounts passed, and also the amount realized by sales of estates; and are as follows:—

Summonses to originate proceedings:—

For the administration of estates	332
Under the Charitable Trusts Acts	81
For appointment of guardians and maintenance of infants	146
For other purposes	91

We may mention that in 1853 this class numbered only 475

Other summonses 16,381

Referring again to 1853, this class then numbered only 6,862

Orders made:—

Of the class drawn up by the registrars	6,772
Of the class drawn up in chambers	5,770
Orders brought into chambers for prosecution (including 11 for winding up companies)	1,930

Debts claimed and adjudicated upon:—

Number of debts	4,020
Amount of debts proved	£1,288,387

Accounts passed (other than receivers' accounts):—

Number of accounts	475
Receipts therein	£1,124,306
Disbursements and allowances therein	909,803

Sales of estates under orders of court:—

Number of sales	490
Amount realized	£1,745,840

Purchases of estates under orders of court:—

Number of purchases	84
-------------------------------	----

Orders for winding-up companies:—

Amount of calls made	£799,092
Total amount of fees collected by stamps	11,401

Number of contributories:—

Included in list of contributories	1937
Excluded from lists of contributories	119

These returns would be yet more useful if they showed the proportions in which the business was distributed between the judge and the chief clerk. They disclose, at all events, an immense amount of business, which, if it had been transacted clumsily, would have been long since brought before the notice of the public. The statistics should state the number of cases in which summonses for administration were found insufficient and bills became necessary, also data for comparing the relative superiority in point of time and of expense, which procedure by summons enjoys over suits instituted by bill, or claim. The figures given above, however, are abundantly sufficient to show with what ability and success the chief clerks conduct business at chambers, the best proof of which is the immense amount which they get through with but little assistance, and without giving rise to any dissatisfaction.

The proceedings in the office of the clerks of records and writs indicate more particularly the number and class of the suits before each court, which were as follows:—

Suits instituted:—

Bills or informations filed	2,083
Claims filed under general order of 1850	76
Special cases filed under Act 14 Vict. c. 35	43
Administration summonses filed	327
Other originating summonses filed	318

In suits by bill or information the number of interrogatories filed was:—

By plaintiffs	1,460
By defendants	13
The number of pleas filed was	10
" " of answers	1,884
" " of demurrers	37
" " of disclaimers	4
And of traversing notes	5

Under the head of general proceedings the number of petitions filed is returned as 2,440; of affidavits filed, 46,976. The total of the fees collected in this office was £25,905.

A word on law taxes may not be irrelevant here. It is not more irrational to tax a party injured in his property, than it would be to tax one who is assaulted, or otherwise personally injured. Nor is the want of law taxes a bounty upon litigation; for the loss of time and trouble which a lawsuit entails is a sufficient protection against wanton litigation, which yet, under any circumstances, will always require an expenditure.

The registrars' returns indicate the state of the business in each court, and consist of the following proceedings:—

Pleas	1
Demurrers	30
Exceptions to pleadings	21
Motions for decrees	720
Causes	303
Claims	51
Special cases	43
Causes, &c., further directions	667
Rehearings, and appeals	98
Appeal motions	62
Appeal petitions	21
Total	2,023

Of these classes of proceedings the number of remanets at the end of the year was 440. The chief other business in the registrar's office is returned as follows:—

Orders made on the hearing of petitions, (other than appeal motions)	2,500
Orders made on the hearing of special motions	1,265
Orders on summons drawn up by the registrars	5,679
Orders on motions, or petitions of course	523
Certificates, for sale transfer, or delivery of stock or other securities	2,925
Amount of fees collected by stamps	£12,912

The examiners have returned only two items regarding the evidence taken down by them during the year—viz., the number of witnesses, 436, and the amount of fees collected by stamps, £233.

It does not appear whether this return comprises examinations by special examiners. The report of the commissioners on evidence in chancery 1860, states, we think justly, that it is absurd that one judge should take down the evidence, and another determine its effect. Moreover, the examiner has not power to determine the relevancy of a question, and the expense of taking down much needless evidence may be thus incurred. As equitable rights mainly depend upon documentary evidence and questions of law, the system of affidavits must be regarded as the chief means of taking evidence in chancery; but, on the other hand, when a material fact is disputed, the evidence should be ore tenus before the judge who is to decide the case. At present no party can compel an examination in open court; this is in the discretion of the judge, who may refuse such on application. All the commissioners concur in charging the present system of examination before the examiners with delay and expense. Yet the commissioners recommend ex parte examinations before examiners, the whole of which can be had more cheaply by affidavits. Lord St. Leonards disapproves the latter suggestion, but considers that the present expense of examination is owing to the appointments before the examiners not being attended punctually by the parties. He considers that Nisi Prius turmoil would disturb the quiet necessary for judges determining rights that are mainly dependent upon questions of law, and recommends the continuance of the present system in an amended form, the examiners to be informed of the precise points requiring to be proved, and to have power to regulate the appointments for the examination of witnesses. Lord St. Leonards is, doubtless, right as to the necessity of quiet in courts of chancery, but we consider with the other commissioners that the examination by a judge who is not to decide the case is an error in principle and not detail.

The returns of the Lord Chancellor's principal secretary classify the petitions for hearing as follows:—

In causes	803
Under Acts relating to railways and other public works	317
Under the Trustee Acts, 1850	227
Under the Trustee Relief Acts, 1847 and 1849	245
Under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, 1856	44
Under Acts relating to charities	19
Under Joint Stock Companies Winding-up Acts	20
Under the Infants' Settlement Act, 1855	10
Other general matters	126
Total petitions	1,811

Of these petitions the Lord Chancellor heard 26; the Lords Justices (appeals), 124; Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, 546; Vice-Chancellor Stuart, 586; and Vice-Chancellor Wood, 539. The fees collected by stamps were £1,528. Vice-Chancellor Stuart still retains a slight majority in his proportion of the causes. The number of petitions set down for hearing before the Master of the Rolls was 747, of which 378 were in causes; 24 under the Act relating to leases and sales of settled estates; 2 under Winding-up Acts; and 5 under the Infants' Settlement Act. Besides the foregoing there were 3,551 petitions, upon which orders were granted as of course. The total of fees collected by stamps was £2,199. Of this sum solicitors on admission paid £660 15s., being £1 17s. for each of those admitted, who numbered 384. The number of deeds for enrolment was 9.

The return of the proceedings in the offices of the masters in lunacy comprise 69 orders of inquiry in the nature of commissions of lunacy; 150 reports made to the Lord Chancellor; 67 leases and other deeds settled and approved; and 3,430 summonses issued on all the proceedings. The total amount of receipts in the accounts of the committees and receivers in lunacy passed during the year was £330,149, and the amount of the disbursements and allowances therein £286,098.

The taxing master's return shows that the total number of orders and references for taxation was 3,357; of bills taxed, 7,102; and of certificates and allocations made, 2,955. The total amount of costs taxed was £794,456, and of fees levied on the suitors, 23,676. The business was equally divided amongst the seven masters.

The Accountant General's return represents the state of the accounts of the court to be as follows:—

Paid into court, cash	£8,577,896
Securities and effects	6,737,337
Paid out of court, cash	8,222,155
Securities and effects	5,962,880

The total number of accounts is 22,174; the amount of fees collected, as the rest, by means of stamps, £737 8s. 3d.

We may here state that since the Acts of 1852, the era of the real reform of the Court of Chancery, the business in court has continued nearly stationary, but that in chambers has greatly and progressively increased.

The following was the state of the suitor's fund and of the suitors' fee fund as presented in the annual account to Parliament:—

Suitors' Fund:—

Balance of cash on 1st October, 1858	£	s.	d.
Dividends of £3,904,999 stock	114,709	2	0
Rent of master's offices let to commissioners of patents	520	0	0
Total income	£135,636	1	8

Payments	63,908	10	4
Carried over to Suitors' Fee Fund	51,825	0	6

Total payments £115,733 10 10

Balance of cash on 1st October, 1859	19,902	10	10
--	--------	----	----

Suitors' Fee Fund:—

Balance of cash on 24th November, 1858	80,010	7	3
Cash brought from Suitors' Fund	51,825	0	6
Dividends of £201,028 2s. 3d. stock purchased with surplus fees	5,905	4	0
Brokerage	4,646	1	3
Fees levied on the suitors	97,984	4	0
Total income	£240,370	17	0

--------------------	---------	---	---

--	--------	----	---

The enormous sum paid for brokerage should not be overlooked. It amounts to very nearly the salary of a judge, or to the salaries of four chief clerks. This extravagant payment might easily be reduced to one fourth its amount, as we have already shown, vol. 4, p. 464. At present, all the stock ordered to be sold is actually sold, and all the stock ordered to be bought is actually bought, brokerage being, of course, paid on both transactions; while the proper way unquestionably would be to buy or sell only such amount as might be requisite to make a balance from day to day.

Compensation (including terminable salaries) in respect of abolished offices	74,396	6	3
Salaries of officers	113,655	10	4
Pensions to retired officers	10,692	16	11
Rents of offices	2,071	12	11
Expenses of copying in the office	6,199	19	11
Miscellaneous payments	13,705	7	4

Of this sum £63,908 10s. 4d. are charged on the Sutors' Fund, and £156,813 3s. 4d. on the Sutors' Fee Fund.

These statistics show the oppressive burdens which have been imposed by the Legislature upon the much abused Court of Chancery. If the principle of the nation paying for the blunders of Parliament should come to be recognised in the new Bankruptcy Act—by the transfer to the consolidated fund of the payment of compensations in respect of abolished offices in bankruptcy—there appears to be no reason why suitors in chancery should bear a burden from which suitors in bankruptcy shall have been relieved.

The Sutors' Fund and the Profit Fund have been at different times charged by statutes for different public objects. In 1852, the surplus income of both funds was transferred to "the Sutors' Fee Fund account." The Profit Fund is now represented by a sum of £1,291,629, which the report of the commissioners on the concentration of the courts considers may be appropriated to the building of the new courts in derogation of certain alleged rights of the suitors or their representatives, from the investment of whose cash these profits accrued. We have already attempted to show, vol. 4, p. 813, that the Accountant-General is a useless appendage to the monetary system of chancery, and that much time and an expense of £20,000 per annum would be saved if the Bank of England paid out monies in Chancery-lane to the suitors in chancery, as she does in Basinghall-street to the suitors in bankruptcy.

In the Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, the proceedings for the past year are returned as follows:—

Number of suits and matters originated:—

By bills	76
By claim	25
By summons	16
By special case, petitions, &c.	44
	161
Number of interrogatories filed	35
.. of answers, and other defences	38

The number of causes and original matters on motions for decrees, claim, special case, or otherwise, set down during the year, was 123; heard, 116; otherwise disposed of, 7; leaving only 1 remanet. Of causes and matters on motions for further directions 1 case stood for hearing at the commencement of the year; 33 cases were set down for hearing; 33 were heard; and 1 remained for hearing at the end of the year. The total number of decrees and orders was 467, which include 166 made by the registrar.

This Court furnishes a precedent for localizing equity jurisdiction, if such a course be approved in principle, a measure which we do not mean at present to discuss. The difficulty, however, of subjecting rights not directly admitting of a pecuniary estimation to courts with a limited monetary jurisdiction, might perhaps be obviated by compelling the plaintiff in all such causes to elect to take the maximum amount of the monetary jurisdiction in lieu of his equitable right to a specific performance, &c., or have his suit dismissed.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

II.

DEFINITION OF DOMICIL.

As I have hinted in my Introduction, a definition sufficient to take in the general meaning of the word "domicil" has always been, and still is, a matter of uncertainty,

"Grammatici certant et adhuc sub judice lis est;"

and for this plain reason, that whatever definition you may give, depends upon something else; and thus you are endeavouring to describe a thing which has not and cannot be reducible to one standard. For example, take the definition, "residence with intention to remain;" this depends upon two things extremely difficult to ascertain; namely, what is "residence," and what is "an intention to remain." At first sight this may be made a question, but let us consider it a moment, and I think it will be seen that I am correct; what is residence? it may be said to consist in a lengthened stay in one place, the purchase of a domus and furniture; and yet in most cases, even such a purchase as this may not be in perpetuum, but for a limited term only, and unless the party actually dies whilst in the enjoyment of such a fixed property, and unless that was his only fixed property of a like nature, it might be questionable how far a domicile had been created. This, of course, is putting an extreme case, but it is necessary that a general definition should take in every case, and such a case as is here suggested has actually happened, in which commissions were issued to three several countries to examine witnesses, to show, if possible, which of many alleged domicils, standing apparently on precisely the same footing, should prevail.* Then comes the much more veraxa questio, what is "an intention to remain," and this being the "animus," and not the "factum," is a matter entirely of evidence and deduction, and must vary in almost every case. It therefore really comes to this, that you can give nothing but a dependant definition, the fact being that a domicile is that which subjects a man's property to be dealt with according to the particular law of a particular country in which the domicile has been acquired; if Scotch, according to the law of Scotland; if English, according to the law of England; if French, according to the law of France, &c. It may be said again, that if a man resides or many years in a particular place, settling there for good reasons, and there remaining until his death, "what question can there be as to his domicile?" the answer is, there is none; but such a case never comes under the consideration of a court of justice, any more than a man of perfectly upright conduct ever comes within the clutch of the criminal law, as it is only on real questions of uncertainty that any point arises; for "De minimis non curat lex." However, our law has endeavoured to give several definitions of this fickle thing, and we also find attempts made with a like object by foreign authors. Thus, according to the Roman law, a domicile, domicilium, translated usually "a habitation," is, "in whatever place an individual has set up his household gods, and made the chief seat of his affairs, without any special avocation." The word "home" is perhaps the shortest as well as the truest definition, but that still leaves the question open as to what is a man's "home." The French jurists define it to be "the moral relation that subsists between a man and the place of his residence," and Vattel using the word "domicile," translated by the word "settlement," says, "it is a place where a man has the intention to remain always." Boullenois says, "it is a place of society where he may enjoy the advantages of his labours;" and the American definition, where the word is actually used, is "residence at a particular place accompanied with proof or presumptive proof of intention to remain there for an unlimited time." There must be the intention and the fact. As I have before cursorily observed the word "domicil" is of modern introduction into our language, not being found in dictionaries published as far back as Johnson's, but in Todd's edition he inserts it, and writes it "domicile" with an e, and quotes it from an old book called "Brevint's Saul and Samuel at Endor," p. 303, where there is this passage, "This famous domicile was brought with their appurtenances in one night from Nazareth over seas and lands by mighty angels, and can, if honoured with a visit, with an offering, and with a vow, cure in a moment all diseases." Todd's edition was published in 1827, but in an earlier work by Mason (1801), entitled an Addendum to Johnson's Large English Dictionary, the word "domiciliary" occurs, which he renders as adj., from domicile, French, "intruding into private houses;" and says in a bracket, "this word is a new offspring of the French Tyranny," which Todd refers to, but seems to plume himself upon having discovered so erudite an authority as Brevint for the use of the word "domicile," which was, in fact, the first use of the French word in an English composition, and Brevint was not an Englishman, but a native of Jersey, although he graduated at Oxford, and was afterwards Dean of Lincoln, and therefore, allowing all honour due to Mr. Todd's industry, this I look upon as an accidental use of it, more particularly as the natives of Jersey speak French, and that it did not obtain till the year 1830 at the earliest in common use, except in America, and not then common), for in 1827 he was put to the necessity of searching for it in such a recondite authority. He admits, moreover, that it was not to be found in our "lexicography," and says, "Burke uses the Latin word as if he had not known the English." Vattel, in his Law of Nations, treats of the subject of "settlement" in precisely the same manner as "domicil" is now treated of at p. 103 of his work, and as the French word "domicile" was translated "settlement," hence we may infer, that although the word itself was not used at that time in England (the middle of the eighteenth century when he wrote); yet the subject was then discussed among jurists, although it had not monopolized so much attention as since. We, however, find the word used as an English, or at all events as a Scotch word in the Dictionary of Decisions for 1813, Lord Eldon's notes, p. 199.

In Littleton's Latin Dictionary, he translates it thus, "domicilium," domicolium, οἰκητήριον ἑστιάριον, "a mansion, a dwelling house, an abode;" Sedes, Cicero. The word "mansion" certainly signifies a fixed residence, for although it may be let, yet it is usually something belonging to "the family," and likely to be retained as a residence. The next word, "dwelling-house," might be any house, so might the word "abode;" but the word "sedes," as used by Cicero, probably referred to the villa residences in the vicinity of Rome, that is, a place of retirement, or what we, probably from the same word, call a "seat," and there is no doubt that a "country seat" usually answers the description of a domicile. In the Rev. J. G. Wood's very pretty little work entitled "The Common Objects of the Sea Shore," the following passage occurs at p. 115, showing plainly in what sense the word "domicil" is taken by a scholar who is not a lawyer. "These creatures (soft-tailed crabs) are generally called hermit crabs, because each one lives a solitary life in his own habitation, like Diogenes in his tub. . . . The species here given is the common hermit crab (Pagurus Bernhardus), and the particular individual is inhabiting a whelk shell, a domicile, that is in great request when the creature grows to any size." It should be observed, in reference to this passage, that the creatures in question make the shells of deceased univalves their home as long as they answer their purpose, and therefore the word "domicile" is used by Mr. Wood in the sense of "home," which these shells undoubtedly are to the crabs. The word "domicilium" is used by Grotius, lib. ii. cap. 5, s. 24, where there is this passage: "Romanis legibus saltem posterioribus domicilium quidem transferre licebat." The Roman law here referred to is as follows:—"Municipes sunt liberti et in eo loco ubi ipse domicilium suū voluntate tulerunt, nec aliud ex hoc origini patroni faciunt præjudicium et utrobique numeribus astringuntur." Digest, lib. i. tit. 1. "Ad municipipalem et de incolis." Leg. xxii. § 2. In the translation of Grotius by Mr. J. Barbeyrac, in 1788, the word "domicilium" is translated "habitation."

In the case of Forbes v. Forbes, 1 Kay. 341, Vice-Chancellor Wood observed how very unsatisfactory any general definition must be, because the very terms of it implied something else, which was to be defined; and Dr. Lushington, in a very late case came to the same conclusion; but whether we can exactly agree upon a set of words to express it or not, appears to me not to be very material, if we understand the requisite things to be proved to constitute it, the real question being, whether or not a person has by his acts and expressions placed himself in such a position as that, if he dies, the law of the country in which he then is, can be made applicable to whatever personal property (for to such only it applies) he leaves behind him; and I have rather considered this point with reference to the opinions expressed upon it, than to its materiality.

By the statutes of the state of Massachusetts of 1692, 1701, and 1767, domicile is defined to be "coming to sojourn or dwell," "being an inhabitant," "residing and continuing one's residence," "coming to reside and dwell." In the case of The Inhabitants of Abington v. The Inhabitants of Bridgewater, 23 Pickering's American Reports, 170, the above statutes are quoted, and the following pertinent observations made upon the subject. "The question of domicile is often of the highest importance to a person, to determine his civil and political rights and privileges, duties and obligations, it fixes his allegiance, it determines his belligerent and neutral character, and in time of war it regulates his personal and social relations whilst he lives, and furnishes the rule for the disposal of his property when he dies. Yet as a question of fact, it is often one of great difficulty depending sometimes upon minute shades of distinction which can hardly be defined, and it seems difficult to form any exact definition of domicile, because it does not depend upon any single fact or precise combination of circumstances. If the above definition be adopted (referring to the statutes), which seems intended to explain the matter, and put it beyond doubt, it will be found on examination to be only an identical proposition equivalent to declaring that a man shall be an inhabitant where he inhabits, and be considered as dwelling or having his home, where he dwells and has his home. It must often depend upon the circumstances of each case, the combinations of which are infinite. If it be said to be fixed by the place of his dwelling-house, he may have his dwelling-house in different places, if it be where his family reside with himself, he may occupy them indiscriminately, and reside as much in one as another, if it be where he lodges or sleeps (per noctat), he may lodge as much at one as the other. If it be his place of business, he may have a warehouse, manufactory, wharf, or other place of business in connection with his dwelling-house, in different towns." This extract will be sufficient to show how the mere question of definition stands; and although the observations are made in America by an American judge, they still apply equally to the general subject.

Before leaving this part of the question, which is in truth of considerable significance, I would refer to some observations made by Vattel at page 101 of his treatise, which are valuable not only by analogy, but to a great extent by direct application. "The whole of the country, possessed by a nation and subject to its laws, forms a part of its territory, and is the common country of all the individuals of the nation." We have been obliged to anticipate the definition of the term "native country" because our subject led us to treat of the love of our country. . . . Supposing then, this definition already known, it remains to explain several things that have relation to this subject, that answer the questions that naturally arise upon it (vide Vattel, p. 63, a 122). The term "country" seems to be pretty generally known, but as it is taken in different senses, it may not be unuseful to give it here an exact definition. It commonly signifies "the state of which one is a member;" in this sense we have used it in the preceding sections, and it is to be thus introduced into the law of nations. In a more confined sense, and more agreeably to its etymology, this term signifies the state (or even more particularly), the town or place where our parents have their fixed residence at the moment of our birth;" in this sense it is justly said that our country cannot be changed, and always remains the same to whatever place we may afterwards remove; . . . but as many lawful reasons may oblige a man to choose another country, that is, to become a member of another society; so, when we speak in general of this duty to our country, the term is to be understood as meaning "the state of which a man is an actual member; since it is the latter in preference to every other state that he is bound to serve with his utmost efforts. At p. 102, s. 215, he proceeds: "It is asked whether the children born of a citizen in foreign countries, are citizens? The law has decided that question in several countries, and those regulations must be followed. By the law of nature alone children follow the condition of their fathers, and enter into all their rights. The place of birth produces no change in this particular, and cannot, of itself, furnish any reason for taking from a child what nature has given him. I say, of itself; for civil and political laws may, for particular reasons, ordain otherwise, but I suppose that the father has not entirely quitted his country in order to settle elsewhere. If he has fixed his abode in a foreign country, he has become a member of another society, at least as a perpetual inhabitant, and his children will be members of it also." (I give this from the English translation for greater convenience.) I have written in italics those portions of the above quotation which more directly bear upon my subject, and I think it is very clear that the subject now called by the word "domicil" entered very largely under the title of "settlement" (the French word "domicile" being so translated) into the consideration of the law of nations at the time Vattel wrote, and those expressions which I have so particularised, apply very specially to it, as at present treated of and understood, besides referring to other portions of the same subject. In considering any subject, it is of the last consequence that we should understand fully what it is we are going to consider, and hence, anything tending to elucidate the definition has its use.

The Courts, Appointments, Promotions, Vacancies, &c.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH. GUILDHALL.

Dec. 18.—In the course of the trial of a cause of Hooper v. Ward, the Lord Chief Justice complained of the bad regulations for keeping order in this court, and said that if the other courts at Guildhall were like it, they were a disgrace to the city. The accommodation for junior counsel is limited to one row of seats, with desks to write upon, and although there are two benches behind without any writing accommodation whatever, the seats are usually allowed to be filled by curious spectators. Ingress and egress during important trials require great strength and perseverance, and the noise in the galleries, where there are no police, drowns the voices of judge, barristers, and witnesses.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings, at Nisi Prius, at Guildhall, before the LORD CHIEF BARON and a special jury.)

Dec. 14.—Druce v. Pickering.—The plaintiff, who is practising in the city of Oxford as an attorney, brought this action against the defendant, a railway contractor, to recover damages for wrongfully causing the plaintiff to be arrested and imprisoned. The defendant pleaded a justification of the arrest on the ground that he had intrusted the plaintiff with certain promissory notes to be discounted, and with directions that the proceeds should be applied to a specified purpose, and that the defendant unlawfully applied the money to his own use. Before the termination of the plaintiff's examination, however, the defendant withdrew his pleas of justification, and expressed his extreme regret for having made the charges against the plaintiff. The plaintiff, who had brought the action solely with a view to clear his character and prove the untruth of the defendant's charges, thereupon consented to take a verdict for 40s. without costs, which was accordingly done.

The LORD CHIEF BARON expressed his entire satisfaction at the course which had been adopted.

Druce v. Bricknell.—This was an action of slander, arising out of the matter complained of in the case above, and was brought to recover damages from the defendant, the vicar of Eynsham, for having stated that he had heard that the plaintiff had been arrested for forgery. The defendant having denied that he had ever intended to slander the plaintiff, the plaintiff consented that the case should terminate by the withdrawal of a juror, which was done.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

BUSINESS OF THE COURT.

Dec. 18.—This was the last day of the sittings for divorce business before Christmas. During the 10 days of the sitting 16 causes have been tried, and 13 decrees have been granted. In one case a decree has been suspended, and in two cases time has been taken for consideration. In 14 cases the petitions were by husbands.

WINTER ASSIZES.

YORK.

(Before Mr. Justice HILL.)

Dec 15.—The grand jury having got through all the bills preferred, the foreman, Col. J. Smyth, addressed his lordship, and said—"We desire to hand in to your lordship a memorial in regard to what we consider to be the inadequate remuneration of witnesses." His lordship said he would take care that it was forwarded to the proper authorities.

The following is a copy of the memorial which was presented:—

"The grand jury of the county of York, at the winter gaol delivery in December, 1860, desire most respectfully to call the attention of the Hon. Mr. Justice Hill to the scale of allowances to prosecutors and witnesses in criminal cases at assizes and quarter sessions, as being quite insufficient adequately to remunerate those in the humbler walks of life who are necessarily called away from their families and their ordinary occupations, for their expenses and loss of time, by which last expression the grand jury understand the statutes 7th George 4, cap. 64, s. 22, and 14th & 15th Victoria, cap. 45, to mean the reasonable allowance for the loss of their wages during the time such witnesses are necessarily absent from their homes and their work. Those of the grand jury who are acting justices are not unfrequently very much embarrassed by the extreme reluctance of material witnesses to come forward to prosecute and give evidence in criminal cases of the gravest kind, as well as in all other cases likely to be sent for trial at assizes and quarter sessions within their jurisdiction, by reason of the loss of wages they thereby sustain, and the consequent privation to which their families are subjected. Necessary witnesses not unfrequently declare that, from their experience in former cases, they are reluctant, and even decline, again to come forward as witnesses. The grand jury are of opinion that justice is greatly impeded, and in many cases defeated, by the inadequate remuneration awarded under the present scale of allowances, and, from their observation and experience, they fear this is an increasing evil.

"J. G. SMYTH, Foreman."

CROWN COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice KEATING.)

Dec. 15.—At the sitting of the court this morning the jury who had heard the case of a letter carrier, and who had been enclosed all night in consequence of their not having agreed to their verdict, were again brought into court. The Clerk of the Crown having asked them if they had agreed upon their verdict, the Foreman stated, they had not. The Judge: Gentlemen, is there any probability of your agreeing? The Foreman: I am not aware that there is the slightest probability of our agreeing. We have argued the question over and over again; and there does not appear to be the slightest probability of our agreeing. A Jurymen: If we should be kept for a month we should not agree. The Judge: I think you have been detained sufficiently long to ascertain the improbability of your agreeing. Under these circumstances I shall discharge you from giving your verdict. Let the prisoner be remanded.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT

Dec. 16.—The December sessions of the above Court was opened before the Right Hon. W. Cubitt, M.P., Lord Mayor; Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., Recorder; Aldermen Sir R. W. Carden, Rose, and Lawrence; Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton, and Mr. Under-Sheriff Gammon.

The calendar was lighter than usual.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Dec. 17.—The December adjourned general sessions commenced this morning at the Guildhall, Broad Sanctuary, Westminster, before Mr. Bodkin, Assistant-Judge, Mr. Payne, Deputy, and several magistrates.

The calendar was very heavy.

The revising barristership of the city of London has become vacant by the death of Mr. T. Y. McChristie.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Stewart Campbell, Esq., to be one of her Majesty's counsel for the province of Nova Scotia.

EQUITY.

UNDUE INFLUENCE—PARENT AND CHILD—SETTING ASIDE FAMILY SETTLEMENT.

Jenner v. Jenner, L. C., 9 W. R. 109.

The doctrine of undue influence, arising out of the relation of parties, has been of late discussed by the courts with unusual frequency; and there can hardly be said to be any question left open as to what the doctrine really is. It has been so fully laid down in the modern case of Baker v. Bradley, 7 D. M. & G. 579, and in Savery v. King, H. Lds., 4 W. R. 571, that it is unnecessary to state it here. In the latter case, which, in some respects, was not very unlike the present, the bill having there been filed by one who being a tenant in tail, in the lifetime of his father, had charged his inheritance partially for the benefit of the father, considerable stress was laid upon the fact that the son, who, at the time of the transaction, had only recently come of age, had not the advantage of independent professional advice, the incumbrancer himself being a solicitor, which was no doubt another important element in the case. In the present case also no solicitor had been employed to act independently on behalf of the son, the tenant in tail, which, it was argued, was sufficient of itself for the impeachment of the transaction. The Lord Chancellor, however, was of opinion that this circumstance of itself was not sufficient; and that, although the father's solicitor prepared the deeds, yet inasmuch as there was evidence to show that the son was well acquainted with and advised of the effect of the provisions of the deeds before they were executed by him—the transaction, moreover, being reasonable and for the good of the family, and not being for the personal benefit of the father—it was one which the Court would affirm. The following dictum of Lord Justice Turner in Baker v. Bradley, 7 D. M. & G. 620, may be taken as the most intelligible expression of the general rule of the Court affecting such transactions:—"Transactions," said his lordship, "between parent and child may proceed upon arrangements between them for the settlement of property, or of their rights in property, in which they are interested."

In such cases this Court regards the transactions with favour. It does not minutely weigh the considerations on one side or the other. Even ignorance of rights, if equal on both sides, may not avail to impeach the transaction. On the other hand, the transaction may be one of bounty from the child to the parent soon after the child has attained twenty-one. In such cases this Court views the transaction with jealousy, and anxiously interposes its protection to guard the child from the exercise of parental influence."

PRACTICE—INTERROGATORIES.

Marsh v. Keith, V. C. K., 9, W. R. 115.

The practice was well understood, and very much in vogue amongst equity draftsmen, before the modern Chancery Amendment Acts, of inserting in bills a certain class of averments for the mere purpose of founding interrogatories upon them; and the model bill appended to the orders of 1852 allowed it to remain in doubt whether such averments should be continued, although there could be no doubt that they were opposed to the spirit of the Act and the whole tenor of the new practice. Amongst other points raised in the above case, the point we have mentioned was for the first time definitively settled. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was of opinion that the paragraph in the model bill above alluded to was inserted per incuriam; and that under the new practice nothing more was required in the bill than the allegation of whatever substantially constitutes the plaintiff's case. It must be borne in mind, however, that these remarks only point to the abolition of those fictional averments which were formerly so common, but which are now of rare occurrence in Chancery proceedings; and the effect of his Honour's observations is merely that the right of the plaintiff not is restricted by such omissions.

COMMON LAW.

PARENT AND CHILD—RIGHT TO CUSTODY—HABEAS CORPUS

Ex parte Barford, 9 W. R., Q. B., 99.

The power of a parent over his child (says Blackstone) "is moderate, but still sufficient to keep the child in order and obedience." Of the latter branch of this proposition the present case is an apt illustration; for by it the right of the father to the custody or control of his child's person, until the age of discretion, is completely confirmed, as well as his right to regain its possession by writ of habeas corpus if the child below this age be taken or detained from his natural or legal guardian. It is, however, also laid down by Blackstone (1 Com. p. 461), that this right continues until the age of twenty-one. But this does not seem to be law, taken to its full extent. For the courts will not interfere summarily by habeas corpus to take a child out of the custody in which it may happen to be, provided it has arrived at an age to exercise a discretion in the matter. The question therefore is, what is the age of discretion for this purpose? and with regard to this, the present case lays down this general and important rule, viz., that mental precocity is no test whatever. And the Court, in laying down this doctrine, added that they had arrived at the conclusion that the age of sixteen is the age under which a minor is unfit to choose for her (or him) self, in whose custody she (or he) will be. And that this limit has only been fixed by them after great and deliberate consideration and after consultation with all the judges.

It may be observed that the Courts of Common Law will not assist a parent, by habeas corpus or otherwise, in regaining the possession of his child if it be shown that he is unfit to have it by reason either of cruelty or immorality. And where an infant, of whatever age, is possessed of property so as to fall within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, that Court will always interfere to protect it against a guardian (even though he be also the parent) whose conduct renders him grossly unfit for the office. (See for example, Shelly v. Westbrook, Jac. 266; Wellesley v. Wellesley, 2 Bligh., N. S., 124.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—RETAINER—MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Lewis v. Mayor and Corporation of Rochester, 9 W. R., C. B., 100.

The most general point of interest arising in the present case, is with regard to the authority of the mayor of a borough to retain the services of an attorney at the expense of the corporation, against the will of the minority of the town council. The mayor in question (together with the borough assessors) had been proceeded against in the Queen's Bench (see 7 Ell. &

Bl. 910), for omitting to revise the burgess list as by law required to do, and it was in reference to these proceedings that the retainer of the plaintiff in the present action had been given.

The Court of Common Pleas were unanimous in thinking that the mayor had a right to defend these proceedings in the Queen's Bench at the expense of the borough—and this even assuming he had made through ignorance, "a very remarkable mistake" in omitting properly to revise the burgess list. For they considered that he was justified in obtaining the opinion of that Court as to the mode in which he could best rectify his error, and even carry up the proceedings to a court of error if supported by sound legal advice that such was his proper course.

DAMAGES, MEASURE OF—COUNTY COURT APPEAL, COSTS OF.

Gee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 9 W. R., Exch., 103.

The first point in this case is upon the question of the proper measure of damages. In actions of contract this is now (in the greater number of instances) governed by the rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer in the well known case of Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341), which established the proposition that the breaker of a contract was not liable to the other party for damage which the parties at the time of entering into the contract, could not have reasonably expected would probably result from the contract being broken. Accordingly in that case (which was an action against a carrier) the plaintiff was held not to be entitled to recover the profits which he might have made during the period of delay by a certain implement unreasonably delayed in its transit. And so also in the present case (which was an action of the same kind), it was held a misdirection to tell a jury that they might take into their consideration not only the wages which the plaintiff had had to pay his workmen during such period of unreasonable delay, and while he was daily expecting the arrival at his mill of certain cotton which had been consigned to him, and sent through the defendants; but also the profits he would have made by working such cotton if it had arrived in time—he having at his mill no other stock of cotton to proceed with, a fact of which the defendants had no notice.

The other point in this case is with regard to the costs of an appeal from a county court. The Court gave judgment for the appellants, and it was contended that in all such cases the costs of the appeal were granted. But the Court said that in the superior courts, if a new trial was granted on the ground of misdirection, no costs were given, and that the same rule must be followed in appeals from the county courts.

ACTION OF SLANDER, COSTS IN—DAMAGES UNDER 40s.

Evans v. Rees, 9 W. R., C. P., 73.

This was an action for slander, in which the plaintiff recovered only one shilling as damages; but in which the judge who presided at the trial certified, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, that the slander was "wilful and malicious." Relying on this certificate, the Master allowed the plaintiff the usual costs of the action; but the Court ordered his taxation to be reviewed on the ground that there was still existing a statutory enactment prior to the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24 (viz. 21 Jac. 1, c. 16, s. 6), which, in actions for slanderous words, made the costs of the plaintiff to equal only the damages assessed by the jury, in cases where such damages fell below 40s. (As to this statute being still in force, see also Lush Pr. 2nd ed., p. 689.)

It may be observed that a case such as the present does not seem to be affected by the new provision, with regard to the costs of frivolous actions, in the Common Law Procedure Act of the present year. For while that provision does not allude in any way to any previous Act on the subject, it operates only to deprive the plaintiff of costs, where the defendant obtains a certificate that (in an action of slander) the grievance in respect of which the action was brought, was not wilful and malicious, or that the action was not fit to be brought; whereas, in the present case, the judge, on the application of the plaintiff, certified just the other way. It may be added, however, that the present case shows this—namely, that though the plaintiff would not be deprived in the present case of his costs, by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 34, he would, notwithstanding that provision, be unable to claim more costs than damages, under the statute of James.

LODGING HOUSE KEEPERS—NON-LIABILITY FOR LOSS OF LODGERS' GOODS.

The recent case of Holder v. Soulby, 8 W. R. 438, and 29 L. J. N. S. C. P. 246, decides that a lodging house keeper is not liable for the loss of the lodgers' goods. Calve's case, 1 Smith's L. C. 47, is referred to in which the responsibility of an innkeeper is confined to the goods of passengers and wayfarers; and Erle, C. J., says the reason why the law makes an innkeeper liable is that a wayfarer has no means of knowing the character of those with whom he may come in contact at the inn.

I submit that this reason applies with as much force to a lodger as to a wayfarer, and that if an innkeeper is bound to receive a wayfarer, and to answer for the character of those with whom he may come in contact, much more should a lodging house keeper, who is under no obligation to receive a lodger, answer for the character of those with whom the lodger may come in contact. Taking the law to be as laid down, it follows that when A. and his family are located in lodgings at the sea side, if they venture out for a walk, drive, or dip, they must, to avoid loss, "carry their baggage with them."

COMMISSIONER TO ADMINISTER OATHS.

Is it a matter of obligation or not on a commissioner to administer oaths either in the common law or equity courts, to swear a party to an affidavit, &c., who brings it properly prepared, and is ready to pay him the usual fee for the oath?—in other words, has a commissioner a right to swear whom he pleases?—or is he, as an officer of the particular court, bound to administer the oath to all who come to him in due form? Perhaps some correspondent can answer the question and give authorities.

A COMMISSIONER, &c.

THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS.

I cannot help giving my meed of praise, although it is quite superfluous, to Mr. Johnson's very able paper on the Law of Judgments, published in your Journal of the 10th ult. In the summary at the conclusion of the essay, he says:—"If it is right so severely to restrict judgment claims, as is done by the late Act, it is equally right and incomparably more convenient to relieve purchasers and mortgagees altogether from them." Most persons, I think, will agree with the above proposition; and for myself I have often thought that it would be a consummation much to be wished, to abolish judgment charges altogether on landed property. It would be a great boon so far as professional men are concerned, who take the responsibility on their own shoulders of not searching for incumbrances where they think there is no risk, in order to save their clients expense, and many have often had to suffer from the consequences of this consideration for their clients' pockets and their good nature.

Now, I cannot comprehend on what principle the law should fetter land with charges and incumbrances, and not other descriptions of property. Lands and houses certainly are the most tangible and permanent species of property, although not always the most valuable of a man's possessions; but I do not see that that circumstance should subject them alone to incumbrance claims. Houses and lands are not so easily disposed of as other property; and the very fact of the notoriety that attends the ownership operates as an argument rather against than for their being charged with incumbrances.

The argument that charges on property act as a check upon dishonest debtors, does not touch our present question, namely "Why one species of property should be preferred to another, but assuming this argument to apply to every kind of property, it does not always operate as a check, inasmuch as searches are not always made, much dependence being placed upon a man's position, rank, and character; and in those cases where a purchaser is deceived, the real Simon Pure perhaps escapes altogether in consequence of poverty, dishonesty, or being non est when wanted, whilst the unsuspecting purchaser is fleeced, and pays for all. Many persons will start up and say, "Serve him right, he ought to be more careful, he had the means of searching, and he must take the consequences of his neglect." Now no one denies these assertions so far as the lawyer is concerned, therefore there is no occasion to make them; but as to the purchaser, the poor man remains probably in blissful ignorance till they come down on his lands; and then what will the unsophis-ticated say of the morality and honesty of the scheme that thus robs Peter to pay Paul?

I believe the great bulk of land-holders are not judgment debtors, and that that class is a very small minority; and if my assumption is correct (and I think it will not be denied when we reflect how seldom judgments are discovered in cases where searches are deemed necessary to be made), does it not follow as a consequence, from the fact of searching being a useless proceeding, that it operates as a grievous burden upon landed property, on purchasers, and more especially on mortgagors, whose pressing necessities often compel them to borrow on security of their estates?

If there were no other reason against registering charges on land than the last I have mentioned, I think it sufficient for abolishing their claims; and as Mr. Johnson states that Lord St. Leonards' Act has reduced them to a shadow, I think that a still better argument for dispensing with them altogether.

I should be glad to have your opinion on the question, as I think it is one deserving of consideration by the members of the profession.

The Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.—The annual dinner of the Liverpool Law Society was held in the large room of the Adelphi Hotel in this town on Saturday evening, the 15th inst. Between eighty and ninety gentlemen being present. Mr. Dodge, president of the society, occupied the chair. Mr. Radcliffe and Mr. Ambrose Lace occupied the vice-chairs. Mr. T. S. Raffles, stipendiary magistrate, Mr. John Laird, and Mr. Winstanley, were among those present. In the course of the evening the following (among other toasts) were enthusiastically received. "The common law and chancery bar," which was proposed by Mr. Alderman J. B. Lloyd, and responded to by Mr. Winstanley; and "The Manchester Law Society," which was proposed by Mr. Radcliffe, and responded to by Mr. Baker.

BRISTOL.—Dec. 12.—Re Thomas Rennie Hutton, late official assignee of the Bristol Bankruptcy Court.—The audit account of the moneys recovered from the sureties of Mr. Hutton, and the payments thereout incurred in the investigation of the various estates, law charges, &c., was passed to-day, and showed a balance of £6009 19s. 4d. in the hands of the accountant in bankruptcy, subject to the order of the Court for division among the various estates. It will be recollected that the deficiencies, as ascertained by the late Mr. P. R. Power, amounted to £12,096 6s. 1d.

LEICESTER.—Leicester Law Society.—A meeting of the solicitors of Leicester was held on the 27th ult., Mr. Richard Toller (clerk of the peace for the borough) in the chair, when resolutions approving of the formation of a Law Society were passed unanimously, and a committee was appointed to consider the rules. An adjourned meeting was held on the 13th instant, Mr. Richard Toller in the chair, and the rules of the society and the report of the committee were read. The committee reported that they had framed the rules of the society on the basis of those of the Liverpool Law Society, and after referring to several matters of detail relating to the finances and library, the committee concluded their report by expressing their satisfaction that the society would number amongst its members nearly all the solicitors in the town, and by congratulating the profession both in the town and county upon the formation of a society which would seek to elevate the character of the profession and to promote confidence, good feeling, and honourable practice amongst its members. On the motion of Mr. Berridge, seconded by Mr. Luck, a resolution proposing the immediate formation of the society was carried unanimously, and on the motion of Mr. Stone (town clerk) seconded by Mr. George Toller, the rules of the society and the report of the committee were adopted unanimously. Mr. Harris was appointed President—Mr. Stone, Vice-President—Mr. Ingram, Treasurer—and Mr. Bouckell, Secretary for the ensuing year. The managing committee was afterwards appointed, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman and to the preliminary committee and secretary.

NEWCASTLE.—The 34th annual meeting of the Newcastle and Gateshead Law Society was held on Wednesday, the 12th inst. when the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:—Mr. H. W. Fenwick, president; Mr. Geo. Armstrong, vice president; Mr. R. R. Dees, treasurer; Messrs. Wm. Crighton and James Radford, secretaries. The standing committee were re-elected, with the addition of Mr. J. A. Bush, Messrs. Robert Spence Watson, Thomas Swinburne, Edward Leadbitter, and W. B. Mortimer, were elected members. The annual dinner was afterwards held at the Queen's Head in Newcastle, Mr. G. W. Hodge (vice-president), in the absence of Mr. Clayton, the Town Clerk (the president), in the chair; Mr. Crighton taking the vice-chair.

ROCHDALE.—In a recent case at the Rochdale County Court, before Mr. Temple, the judge declined to receive the evidence of a witness for the plaintiff, who stated that she did not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments, in any responsibility for telling a lie, or in a God; and nonsuited the plaintiff with costs.

COUR IMPERIALE DE PARIS.

LES NOCES DE FIGARO—RIGHTS OF AUTHORS.

It is legal for the Committee of the Society of Dramatic Authors to stipulate with the directors of theatres for fixing the rights of the associated authors, and the latter cannot by particular agreements modify the treaties thus entered into, to the prejudice of the society.

The celebrated work of Beaumarchais (Le Barbier de Séville) was recently discussed in the Cour Imperiale of Paris, in a suit between M. Jules Barbier, and the Society of Dramatic Authors and Composers. M. Barbier and M. Carré had been intrusted by M. Carvalho, the director of the Théâtre-Lyrique, with the task of adapting the play of Les Noces de Figaro to the music of Mozart, on the usual terms of remuneration, that is to say 6 per cent. on the receipts. In May 1858, the first representation of the opera took place, and obtained a complete success; but unhappily a dispute arose as to the quantum of remuneration to be received by the authors. A claim was made on behalf of the heirs of Beaumarchais for a moiety of the receipts payable to the author. M. Barbier conceiving that his work had the merit of originality, and that the Committee of the Society of Dramatic Authors were not justified in depriving him of the fruits of his labours, resisted the claim and commenced an action for the recovery of his demand. The cause turned on the effect of a treaty entered into by the Committee of the Society of Dramatic Authors, with the director of the Théâtre Lyrique.

By the French law, the heirs of dramatic authors are only entitled to thirty years' enjoyment of their rights, reckoning from the time of the death of these authors, and the death of their widows; after this period the works become part of what is called the public domain, that is to say, they may be represented by the directors of theatres without paying any per centage on the receipts. The Society of Dramatic Authors and Composers is a society established for the protection of the rights of the members, and for that purpose it from time to time enters into agreements with the directors of the different theatres, providing for the terms upon which the productions of dramatic authors and composers are to be represented. This society, conceiving that the provisions of the existing law were inequitable as regards the heirs of dramatic authors, some time since entered into an agreement with M. Carvalho, the director of the Théâtre-Lyrique, by which it was determined that every time any work entitled of the public domain should be represented, the representatives of deceased authors should receive a sum equal to what would be allotted to these works if they were the works of living authors. It was also stipulated by this agreement that wherever the works of deceased authors were altered for modern representation, in such cases the per centage payable in respect of the works so altered should be divided equally between the representatives of the deceased author, and the person or persons employed in altering or adapting the original work for the stage.

M. Barbier, in support of his claim, maintained that although the plot of the work which caused the litigation "Les Noces de Figaro," was taken from the celebrated work of Beaumarchais, yet that in fact and really it had every claim to be considered as an original work: that this being so, the committee of the Society of Authors had exceeded their powers by making an agreement which would have the effect of depriving an author of the just reward of his industry. The Court, however, was of opinion that it was quite competent for the Committee of the Society of Authors to make such a stipulation as that which was called in question by M. Barbier; that the society was instituted for the purpose of protecting the rights of dramatic authors generally, and that no individual could be permitted, on the ground of personal loss, to break through an agreement which undoubtedly was for the benefit of the community of authors: accordingly the suit of M. Barbier was dismissed with costs.

An English gentleman named Grant recently brought before the Civil Tribunal an action against a tailor named Ville to recover 1,000*fr.* as damages for a vexatious arrest. From what was stated it appeared that Mr. Grant had been a customer of the tailor for about two years, and paid him regularly. Some time back a dispute arose as to a garment which did not fit him, and which he refused to receive; an angry altercation ensued, and the Englishman turned the tailor out of doors. The tailor, on the representation that Mr. Grant was a foreigner, lived in an hotel, and might leave the country, obtained from the President of the Civil Tribunal an order for his arrest for the value of the garment. Mr. Grant was taken into custody, but immediately paid the sum claimed, and was released. The Tribunal declared that the arrest was "a measure of excessive rigour, not justified by a legitimate fear of the disappearance of the debtor," but that nevertheless Mr. Grant had not sustained any real injury, and that therefore no other damages than costs need be awarded.

Concise Forms of Wills, with Practical Notes. By W. HAYES and T. JARMAN, of the Middle Temple, Esqs., Barristers-at-law. Fifth Edition, by THOMAS SMITH BADGER, M.A., of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and of Lincoln's Inn, Esquire, Barrister-at-law, Reader on the Law of Real Property to the four Inns of Court. Sweet, 1860.

The little book familiarly known as "Hayes and Jarman" has long been the vade mecum of conveyancers. It is said, with what truth we know not, that some old-fashioned lawyers invariably make it a travelling companion, for the sake not only of its law but of its literature, although the former is mainly to be found in the shape of short notes, and the latter finds expression in the difficult form of concise precedents. The joint production of two of the most accomplished conveyancing counsel, one of them being, moreover, about the most elegant legal writer of the time, could hardly fail to find universal acceptance among lawyers, even though its subject were not of such general interest. Solicitors have been accustomed to regard it with peculiar favour, because it is exactly suited to their requirements. Complete but not diffuse, accurate but not pedantic, eminently practical and yet a reliable exponent of principles, it was all that the lawyer engaged in the practice of his profession could desire as a guide in one of his most difficult duties. It is no wonder then that it has so long and so well kept its ground against all comers. Nothing but an ever gathering host of new authorities ranged under some hostile banner could ever drive it from the field; and this undesirable event Mr. Badger has for the present effectually averted. With industry worthy of the cause he has drawn contingents from every available quarter, and with the science of an able general has disposed of his forces in a manner to command entire approval. All lovers of "Hayes and Jarman" may therefore still cling to their treasure, without fear of being surprised by some unhappy ambuscade of the reporters' legion, or of being overwhelmed by the ever rising tide of judge-made law. Whatever may be done for the defence and security of practitioners, who are accustomed to be called upon betimes, without much warning, to do battle with or out-manoeuvre the hosts of recorded decisions, which threaten to cross the purposes, and to defeat the intentions of testators, has been done in this edition of "Hayes and Jarman." Every case of any significance relating to the law of wills is to be found in this still (comparatively) small volume. Very many decisions are no doubt only referred to in groups, without any attempt to exhibit the nice distinctions between members of the same group, such as might be looked for in a more elaborate treatise. But the classification, such as it is, is extremely well made, and is always sufficient, not only to put a lawyer "upon enquiry," but also to point out to him the most direct and useful sources of information. "Prudens interrogatio dimidium scientiæ," said Lord

Bacon, when speaking of the value of hypothesis in physical investigations; and so it may be said that the use of a lawyer's manual is not to tell him what the law is, so much as to direct him how and where to search for it amid the hundreds of volumes where it lies veiled from the vulgar view. The book now before us is most skilfully adapted for this purpose; for while it would be impossible in so small a compass to give any thing like a treatise upon the subject of wills, the authors (including the present editor) have noted all the decided cases down to the present time, having special regard to the convenience of persons accustomed to the use of precedents. We have been unable to discover the omission of any cases of importance, whether appearing in what are called the "authorized," or the hebdomadal, reports. Indeed Mr. Badger has very much increased the value of the work by adding to it, not merely the modern decisions in courts of equity and common law, but also those of the ecclesiastical courts and the Privy Council, for which diligent search appears to have been made. All the old precedents, moreover, have been revised; and more than a hundred pages of useful miscellaneous forms have been added by the present editor. Among the most valuable contributions which he has made to the notes, may be mentioned those relating to the power of executors to sell under a charge to pay debts, p. 430; and to the law of domicil, p. 19. The appendix also contains a note on the execution of wills at the Cape of Good Hope, which has been adapted by the editor from a communication which has been made to him by Mr. Porter, (the Attorney-General at the Cape) on the Roman Dutch law touching this point.

As there may be some of our younger readers who have not read the prefatory observations to the "Hayes and Jarman" of five-and-twenty years ago, we shall extract from it the following passage which bears the marks of Mr. Hayes' pen.

"A notion," says the writer, "has unfortunately obtained, that, while to the preparation of a deed learning and experience are essential, the disposition of a man's property by will may be safely confided to the minimum of legal knowledge. Hence, the conveyancer is rarely consulted, the solicitor is often dispensed with, and the schoolmaster too frequently called in: or, if the schoolmaster be not at hand, there is commonly to be found in every village a will-maker of equal courage and ignorance; the collector or inheritor of exploded forms and phrases. This notion proceeds upon the two-fold error, that wills are expounded, not according to the rules of law, but according to the dictates of common sense, and that common sense is the same in all men. The rules of law, when applied (as applied they must be) to wills thus unadvisedly prepared, often defeat the intention, that is, the probable intention; but if those rules were discarded for a season, common sense, outraged by the conflict of opinion, making one poor word, perhaps, the sport of many contrariant decisions, would soon demand their restoration. The general impression, however, that wills are not amenable to the strict rules of legal construction extended its influence to the judicature, and induced a certain laxity of interpretation, which confirmed and encouraged the original error. Thus confident ignorance on the one hand and judicial indulgence on the other, produced and reproduced blunders and obscurities of every shape and shade which have swelled the mass of adjudication, without advancing the law as a science."

We shall add only one other extract, which shall be for the peculiar benefit of students.

"There cannot, indeed, be a greater mistake than that of supposing that a very small stock of legal terms, added to a very ordinary education, suffices to accomplish the will-maker. On the contrary, a will is alone capable of exhausting the science and ingenuity of the most able conveyancer. It may embrace every allowable modification of property, every possible scheme of disposition. As it is the duty of the will-maker (at least of the solicitor undertaking that office) not merely to draw, but to advise, he should be conversant as well with the various modes as with the various forms of gift; prepared alike to suggest the aptest kind of destination, and to effect it by the aptest words. Even of those testators whose wills are prepared under professional advice, it may be safely affirmed that while the intentions of not a few are frustrated by failure in point of expression, the intentions of a far greater number are never elicited by presenting to their consideration the arrangements most suitable to their views and circumstances. In a large proportion of cases, the nature as well as the language of the disposition, is determined, not by the deliberate choice of the person who makes the gift, exercised over the various modes in which the law allows him to direct the enjoyment of his property after his decease, but by the extent of the knowledge possessed by the person who prepares the instrument, which may therefore be said to exhibit the mind of the framer rather than the will of the testator."

"On the other hand, it must be admitted, that the blame of miscarriage is not unfrequently attributable to the testator himself. Want of explicitness or candour in the communication of the actual state of his property or circumstances, or an obstinate attachment to some favourite project, may render abortive the most judicious advice."

The suggestions for preparing wills, and the directions for their execution, which have so long been the guide and counsel in these particulars of young practitioners, will no doubt remain so for at least another generation of lawyers. To the former Mr. Badger has added some useful hints; and indeed throughout the work, the hand of a skilful and conscientious editor is everywhere visible.

A Treatise on the Law of Highways, comprising the statute law and the decisions of the courts on the subject of highways, public bridges, and public footpaths, practically arranged; including the law of highways in districts under local government boards, the South Wales Highway Act, 1860, and an appendix of statutes. By W. CUNNINGHAM GLEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, Author of "The Law of Public Health and Local Government." Butterworths, 1860.

The Laws of Turnpike Roads, comprising the whole of the general Acts, the Acts as to the union of trusts, for facilitating arrangements with their creditors; the interference of railways and other public works with roads, their non-repair, and enforcing contributions from parishes, (including also the Acts as to South Wales turnpike roads), &c., practically arranged with cases, notes, forms, &c. By GEORGE C. OKE, Author of the "Magisterial Synopsis." 2nd Edition. Butterworths, 1860.

One of the great legislative feats which were to have off last session of Parliament, but stand over until next February, or perhaps indefinitely, was Lord Redesdale's Bill to consolidate and amend the laws relating to highways, and which, whenever it becomes law, and comes into effect, will make Mr. Glen's book prematurely out of date, so far as it is based upon the statutes now in existence. As Lord Redesdale's Bill, however, proposed to postpone its operation, if passed into a law, until the year 1863, there will be probably time enough for the present edition of Mr. Glen's treatise to be exhausted. Until this work on the law of highways, no book on the same subject had appeared since 1829, except some annotated editions of the General Highway Act. Mr. Glen, therefore, undertook a work which was really required, not only by the profession, but by a large class of persons interested in the law of highways; and Mr. Glen's official position has no doubt qualified him peculiarly to discharge such a task with efficiency. He tells us in his preface that "The author has endeavoured to furnish his readers with a lucid exposition of the law of highways, arranged in what may be described as the natural sequence of events, opening with the appointment of officers for the management of the highways, and closing with the enforcement of penalties and forfeitures for offences against the law; so that anyone desirous of ascertaining the law upon any particular subject, may readily find all that he desires to know upon it, expressed in language devoid of technical phraseology and tautology of Acts of Parliament—which are more than usually conspicuous in the General Highway Act. With the same object he has endeavoured to place the decisions of the courts in such a manner as would elucidate the statute law and regulate future proceedings." Mr. Glen has succeeded in what he here proposes, and his treatise will be indispensable to practitioners interested in the law of highways. All the statutes bearing upon the subject appear to have been carefully investigated, and a great number of authorities have been incorporated into the text.

Mr. Oke's book is confined, as its name imports, to the subject of turnpike roads. It commences with a tabular list of the principal General Turnpike Road Acts, showing the time of passing, what each repeals or amends, and where the provisions in force are to be found. Mr. Oke appears to have a genius for the tabulation of statutory enactments, as we recently had occasion to observe when noticing his "Magisterial Synopsis." If another proof were wanting of this observation, it would be found in the book now before us, in which the tables to which we have referred are admirable specimens of tabular exposition of a branch of law. In the introduction to the present work,

Mr. Oke treats of the difference between that portion of our highways known as turnpike roads, and the other very numerous class of public roads not turnpike roads, but which come within the designation of highways. He then proceeds to give a view of the general Acts, 3 Geo. 4 to 9 Geo. 4 (1822 to 1828), and goes on to discuss the alterations in the law since the last-mentioned date. The remainder of the work is composed of chapters treating of trustees and their officers, their appointment, duties, liabilities, &c.; the union of trusts; the purchase of lands by the trustees, and the property in roads; mortgages on the tolls, and the creditors of trusts; the making and diverting of roads, the repairs of roads, and contributions to the same; tolls, their imposition, letting, &c.; the interference of railways and other public ways with roads; and offences as to turnpike roads, their penalties, and mode of prosecution. The appendix relates to Acts affecting South Wales only; and there is to the whole an elaborate index, such as to make the book very convenient for the purpose of reference. All Mr. Oke's books are well done in their way; and his "Turnpike Lawss" is an admirable specimen of the class of books which are required for the guidance of magistrates and legal practitioners in country districts.

Juridical Society.

THE TAXATION OF SUITORS.

At a meeting of the Juridical Society, held on Monday last, Mr. F. S. Reilly in the chair, Mr. S. MARTIN LEAKE read a paper on this subject, which was in substance as follows:—

I have been induced to bring this subject before the Society in consequence of several opinions recently expressed upon it as a ground for important practical conclusions, not having any new theory to propound, but thinking that it would be expedient to come to a clear understanding as to the precise nature of the doctrines involved in the term "taxation of suitors," and wishing to suggest that some points connected therewith are susceptible of a more minute development than they have as yet received.

In the report on the concentration of the courts recently delivered to Parliament, the Vice Chancellor Wood, one of the commissioners, expresses his opinion as follows:—"I entertain a strong opinion that all courts for the administration of justice should be supported by general taxation, and that the protection of property requires that the maintenance of civil tribunals, no less than the police and military force of the country, should be a public burden. Hitherto, however, this principle has not been generally admitted, and the courts have, more or less, been supported by a tax on the suitors of each court in the shape of fees." The Master of the Rolls, in giving evidence before the same commission, states his opinion to a similar effect:—"It is, in my opinion, the duty of the country to provide for the administration of justice without the slightest expense to the suitors. In that respect, I go to the full extent of the speculations of Mr. Jeremy Bentham, but I am also satisfied that you will not at present induce the country to do it." These opinions lead the holders of them to the conclusion that the most appropriate application of a large sum of money now held by the court of chancery, called the Suitors' Profit Fund, would be to relieve the suitors in that court from the payment of fees—a conclusion which I here refer to only for the purpose of pointing it out as a strong illustration of the important practical ends to which the doctrine in question may be made subservient.

On the other hand, in the discussion which arose in the last session of Parliament on the vote for the county courts, much disapprobation was expressed at the large proportion of the expense of these courts which was thrown upon the country; and complaint was made that the funds thus devoted to the aid of litigation were diverted to other purposes, and that these courts were used systematically by loan societies, hawkers and others for the mere purpose of collecting their debts instead of employing regular paid agents for that purpose; and some measures were even suggested as expedient for limiting the facilities for the recovery of small debts.

Bentham's well-known "Protest against Law Taxes," which, I presume, contains the speculations referred to by the Master of the Rolls, is directed exclusively against impositions on judicial proceedings for revenue purposes, and makes no reference to fees imposed upon any other grounds or for any other purposes; whereas the opinions first above quoted maintain a complete exemption of the suitor from all contribution towards the costs of administering justice. The justice and expediency of the imposition of taxes for purposes of revenue depend upon fiscal rather than juridical considerations, and are discussed by Bentham chiefly in that light. He explains how the tax on law proceedings infringes nearly all the conditions which, according to political economists, a tax for revenue purposes should satisfy. It falls at the most unfavourable moment, when the tax payer is already deprived of some property, or right, or subjected to other claims. It is uncertain both in time of incidence and in amount, and cannot at all be foreseen or provided against. The penalty for non-payment is a total denial of justice, carrying with it consequences quite incommensurate and incongruous with the default in payment. Its only fiscal virtue is facility of collection; it executes itself, and gives no room for evasion or smuggling. Bentham further urges many other arguments, on grounds of expediency against the tax, and exposes the fallacy of the common arguments in its favour. I need not here refer to the Protest further than to point out the exact nature of its object, and of the chief arguments used, in order to distinguish them at the outset from the different objects and views proposed for discussion in this paper to which they appear to me to have no application. In Bentham's time, the term taxation of suitors was far more plain and significant than it is at the present day, importing then an actual profit to the State at the expense of the suitor. Fees on law proceedings were very burdensome in all cases, and, there being no effective small debts courts, fell with an equal burden upon all actions, whatever was the amount in dispute. It was computed that the expense of carrying through an action was, at the lowest rate, not less than £24 on the plaintiff's side alone. In the case of small debts, the charge for fees so far exceeded the fair remuneration for the services conferred by the Court, as to leave a large balance to be devoted to other purposes, and was thus equivalent to taxation in the strictest sense of the term. In this broad light the system was regarded by Bentham, and protested against with vigour and success. The diffusion of his doctrines brought about a great curtailment and diminution of fees of all kinds, and probably conducted in a great degree to the establishment at a later date of an efficient system of courts for the recovery of small debts, conducted upon a simple procedure, and in which the fees are proportionate to the amount in dispute.

Bentham's "Protest" has, I believe, been generally considered as conclusive on the fiscal question of raising revenue from law proceedings; and probably no Chancellor of the Exchequer at the present day would think of reverting to litigation as a subject of taxation. Fees, however, still continue to be exacted in all courts, and not without a general feeling that fees to some extent ought to be exacted and are justifiable, at least without any strong feeling to the contrary. This could hardly be the case if arguments, as conclusive as those used by Bentham in his "Protest," were equally applicable to all payments of the kind, with whatever view and for whatever purpose they may be demanded. The term taxation of suitors is vague, in not clearly conveying the purpose for which the tax is levied. Taxation of suitors may be justifiable for some special purpose, though unjustifiable for others; some proceedings in law suits may properly be charged upon the suitors, though others may not. Entirely agreeing with Bentham that law proceedings are not a proper subject for taxation for the general purposes of the revenue, the question appears to me still to remain, whether some payments for some proceedings in actions may not fairly be demanded; and I propose on the present occasion to put the question in the more definite form, whether the taxation of suitors is justifiable for the limited purpose of maintaining the judicial establishments used by the suitors? Ought the courts of justice, with their appendant executive offices, to be provided by the State gratuitously to the suitors; or ought the suitors to bear some, and if so, what share of the expense? The first step towards the solution of these questions seems to be, to determine the exact nature of the relation between the administration of justice and the application for it—the Court and the suitors, with a view to appreciate justly what it is the latter are called upon to pay for, and upon what terms they receive it; and the determination of this relation seems to lie in the general nature of the proceedings in all litigation.

A law suit, properly so called, may be described briefly as a claim by one party against another who repudiates it, an appeal to the court to enforce it, inquiry by the court into the matter in difference, judgment by the court, followed by compulsory execution. In such a transaction there are three distinct parties involved, the plaintiff, the defendant, and the court—in the language of the civil law, actor, reus, and iudex, including here, however, in the term court, all the share contributed by the State, by means of judicial or executive officers, in the progress of a law suit. Each of these parties has his peculiar part to perform: the plaintiff, to prefer his claim in the prescribed form and to support it by all means in his power; the defendant, to state and maintain his case in answer; the court, to decide between them, and regulate the proceedings generally. Each party has to expend time and labour in performing his share in the proceedings; and the costs may accordingly be considered as incurred by these parties, correspondingly to their respective expenditure of time and labour; and we may call them, for the sake of convenience, the costs of the plaintiff, of the defendant, and of the court. The question then of the incidence of the costs of the court as between the court and the parties, becomes the question here proposed for discussion.

It will be found useful to touch briefly upon the other questions which arise as to the distribution of the costs between these parties with the view to distinguish them clearly from the question in hand, and to avoid confusion by assigning the proper place and limits to the familiar maxims and principles connected with the subject. These are, then, the questions as to the costs of the plaintiff and defendant as between themselves; as to the costs of the court as between the plaintiff and defendant; as to the costs of the plaintiff and defendant as between them and the court—all which phases of the great question of costs are quite unconnected with the present, and may be dismissed in a few words.

The costs of the plaintiff and defendant as between themselves are regulated by the well-known rule that the loser pays costs to the winner. It was the practice of our common law to compute the costs of a successful plaintiff as part of his damages, which he recovered against the defendant—a practice which was further enforced by the Statute of Gloucester. The right of a successful defendant to his costs against the plaintiff was not recognised until the statute of Henry 8, since when we may be said to follow strictly the Roman maxim, victus victori in impensis condemnandus est. The general rule, however, is occasionally modified by a discretionary power, which the court exercises over these costs in some instances.

The incidence of the costs of the court as between the plaintiff and defendant follows the same general rule. The rule, indeed, includes all the costs which the successful party is put to, whether incurred in his own behalf, or imposed upon him by the court; so that, where the court makes the suitor pay for its services in the first instance, the successful suitor is reimbursed ultimately by the unsuccessful one, who is thus made to pay the costs of the whole proceedings, both of the successful suitor and of the court. In such case, however, if the unsuccessful suitor becomes insolvent, the successful suitor fails to recover his costs, and the costs of the court in part fall upon him—that is to say, the loser ultimately pays all the costs of the court, but the winner guarantees to the court his share of them by prepayment. Thus, as between the court and the suitors, the maxim that the loser pays costs has no application.

The question respecting the costs of the suitor, as between the suitor and the court, does not appear to have ever raised any difficulty. Though it has been strongly maintained that the Court should pay its own costs, and should charge nothing to the suitor, or at least to the successful one, for its intervention. I am not aware that it has ever been seriously considered that the suitor, though successful, had any claim against the Court, for indemnity against his own peculiar expenses; that is, that it is the duty of the country to conduct the litigation of the suitor entirely at the public expense. Indeed, there would be the greatest difficulty, if not an impossibility, in carrying such an arrangement into effect, as the Court would certainly not indulge the suitor with discretionary expense in collecting evidence and retaining counsel, and the suitor would not submit to have his cause taken out of his own hands and conducted by a mere officer of the Court. In the event of the abolition of all fees the state of things which is contemplated to prevail by the advocates of gratuitous justice is described by the Master of the Rolls, on the occasion previously referred to, as follows:—"A suitor then will have to pay his own solicitor's bill, which is very proper, and his counsel's fees, which is also very proper; but he would not have to pay towards the support of the court, or the support of the judge, or the support of the offices, or even for the purpose of obtaining an authenticated copy of a particular document. He would have merely to pay what it cost, and everything else would be provided for him free of expense. I think that that would be a most desirable state of things." This phase of the question may therefore be dismissed with the assumption that the suitor may be justly charged, as against the Court, with the costs of all the labour which is properly assignable to his share in the drama.

The remaining question is the one to which attention is here particularly invited: Whether the costs of the Court should be paid for by the State or the suitors? That is to say, whether the services of the courts and their attendant offices should be supplied gratuitously to the suitors at the expense of the public, or whether they should be paid for by the individual suitors who require them? These services comprise, speaking in general terms, process, trial or hearing, judgment, and execution, together with the regulation of the necessary accompaniments of records, documents, and evidence. For the purpose of determining on whom the burden of these things should fall, it seems necessary to ascertain what is the position in which the Court stands relatively to the suitor, the nature of the services rendered, for what purpose they are rendered or undertaken, and for whose benefit?

Now independently of the artificial establishment of courts of justice, under what may be called natural procedure, every one would have to depend upon his own resources in seeking redress for an injury, and might avail himself of all his powers of persuasion or force to obtain it. If his own powers were not sufficient, however, he would naturally invoke the assistance of others. He would publish his wrongs and rely upon the justice of his cause for some answer to his appeal. His neighbours and acquaintance would certainly not stand by indifferent, and even strangers would not suffer wrong to pass before their eyes without an attempt at redress. Their moral sense, combined with a regard for their own security under similar circumstances, would prompt an intervention; and their mediation would be rendered, not as a matter of bargain, but as the performance of a duty.

In the present age of the world such a state of things is imaginary, but an analogy may perhaps be found in the intercourse of civilized nations, which are not amenable, in their dealings with one another, to any other law than that of nature, reason, or morality. Amongst the nations of Europe, in theory, at least, the weakest enjoys the protection of the strongest against unjust aggression and injury, and can invoke an assistance which the latter are actuated by motives both of morality and of policy to render. Upon the occasion of a dispute arising between two of this family of nations, it is common, if the matter in difference is an honest one, to appeal to a congress of the other powers for a settlement. Services of this kind are rendered as a matter of duty, and not in the expectation of reward or compensation. The voluntary services of other States, as allies and arbitrators, are regarded with respect and honour, which, as the services of mercenaries, would meet with universal scorn and repugnance. But though the party injured may justly appeal to others for redress, he cannot expect that the efforts of others will supersede all exertions of his own. Assistance will only be extended to him who is wakeful as to his own rights and earnest in maintaining them. It lies upon him to make known his wrong, to prefer the necessary appeals in the proper quarter, and to substantiate his cause by every necessary means in order to convince the world of its justice, and to justify the intervention. As he can have no claim on others to relieve him of these exertions, he can as little claim compensation in respect of them except against his adversary, who has occasioned their necessity. A civil wrong is essentially a private misfortune befalling the individual sufferer only, who can expect no further relief at the hands of the public than an answer to his appeal for redress.

A consideration of the natural order of things upon abstract principles of morality and justice seems to lead to the conclusion that the audience of plaints and adjudication of disputes should be gratuitous. If we turn to the more practical consideration, how and why the administration of justice is embodied in the establishment of a judicature, we shall here find, I think, an additional and more certain reason for the gratuitous intervention of the State. The first duty of a State is to provide for the maintenance of peace and order, and this object imperatively requires the suppression of everything in the nature of private warfare, violence or exaction. The penal laws for the preservation of order at once render every attempt at private redress impossible. It then becomes an act of mere justice on the part of the State to provide a substitute; and the establishment of courts of justice supplies a regular and efficient procedure for the settlement of disputed claims, in place of the irregular and desultory redress by private means. The laws of civil procedure do not alter substantially the characters of the disputants, or the nature of the State intervention; but prescribes a regular and settled form, according to which only redress may be pursued and obtained. The final object of the institution of civil tribunals is the peace of society. The immediate object and most efficient means towards the final end is the exact distribution of justice to individuals. The civil judicature is a general benefit to all, both suitors and non-suitors, though the former only have occasion to use it. If individuals incidentally receive a special benefit, they on the other hand, especially feel the corresponding restriction of liberty; and in consideration of the benefit they tolerate the restriction. The design of the institution is to benefit all equally by the preservation of peace and order, and to this design all should equally contribute. So clear it seems that the suppression of violent redress and private warfare is the prominent and final end of the institution, and the substituted mode of decision merely the means employed to effect it, that in the infancy of jurisprudence we find the final end directly attained with very little regard to the means. Before the intervention of law private quarrels ripened into family feuds which rapidly involved whole provinces in warfare. The first step was to confine the contest to the real litigants; and in the age of judicial combats, courts went no further than to restrict the battle to the actual parties to the suit, and sat by only to secure fair play. Trial by ordeal applied to civil disputes, as a substitute for private feuds was at least highly conducive to peace, and beneficial to the public at large; but it would be hard to maintain that the suitors should be compelled to pay for the privilege of thus deciding their quarrel. In these cases the courts had not yet assumed the jurisdiction of themselves deciding according to settled law, which was ultimately found the most effectual means of suppressing the evil for which it was substituted.

It would seem, therefore, that the State, in assuming the exclusive dispensation of justice, for purposes entirely subservient to its own interests, should do so at its own cost; but that the suitor has no claim to be relieved of his own peculiar costs, being those occasioned by his appeal to the judicature, and the maintenance of his cause before it. A few important subsidiary arguments and explanations remain yet to be noticed.

The rule of law, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, throws all the costs on the loser. It is sometimes suggested that a like rule might be applied with respect to the costs of the court; that they might be fairly imposed on the loser by way of penalty for his false claim. It is imputed to the loser that he is in the wrong, and therefore should be made liable for the consequences. It appears to me that such a rule would be eminently unjust and unreasonable; nor do I think that the prevalence of this rule between the plaintiff and defendant can be accounted for by imputing moral blame on the loser. In causes turning on points of law, the rule operating between the parties would, it is true, be the necessary conclusion from the legal presumption that everyone knows the law. If this presumption were as true in fact as it is sound in theory, the party wrong in his law would also be wrong, in fact, in his conduct, and would justly be made to pay for all the consequences of his wrong. This presumption, however, if carried to its full extent would produce harsh consequences, and is not necessary for a satisfactory explanation of the rule where the law is really doubtful. Each party has at any rate equal means of ascertaining the law, and the same liberty of opinion in construing it, and by resorting to litigation he stakes his construction against that of his opponent; and there seems at least no injustice that as between themselves their expenses should abide the event and be thrown upon him whose construction is erroneous. Besides, it is a general principle pervading all civil transactions, that a party should be held responsible for his acts without any regard to his moral intentions. As between the State and each party, the case is very different. The same rule has no application at all. The doubt in the law is a real hardship upon the parties, and is the cause of their litigation. The State, which makes the law, is the creator of the doubt and the real cause of the litigation, and, therefore, should be held responsible for the costs of the decision. It cannot in justice call upon the parties who are embarrassed by the doubts in the law to pay the expenses of courts which it is found necessary to appoint to decide them: where the dispute is respecting a matter of fact there is not the same special reason why the Court should decide it gratuitously, but the general reasons urged above apply wherever the dispute arises upon a genuine and honest doubt. The jury may be considered as, par excellence, the constitutional English tribunal for trials of fact, and it is worthy of remark that the services of juries are always rendered gratuitously, except where the suitor is not satisfied with the average common sense of the country, and requires a special jury drawn from a superior class. The jury in its origin appears to have exactly embodied the appeal to the neighbours for the settlement of disputes which may be considered as the method of natural procedure.

It may be urged, however, that litigation is sometimes conducted from motives not honest or justifiable, and that it is advisable to cast all the costs of the court upon the suitor, in order to repress frivolous and vexatious litigation. The only justifiable ends of litigation, which the institution of it is designed to satisfy, are those already referred to, namely, the settlements of doubts as to the law, and of differences on matters of fact. A third cause of litigation is often found, in fact, in the wilful assertion of unjust claims and repudiation of just ones; the former dictated by motives of annoyance or extortion, the latter for the purpose of annoyance or delay. But the legitimate ends of litigation only are strictly admissible to consideration in the present discussion. Where there is no real matter in difference either of law or of fact, the suit can have but one result, adverse to the party who promotes it without a cause. The motives of maintaining such a suit can have no further effect than to occasion unnecessary proceedings and costs. A groundless suit is an abuse of the process of the court. Courts were not established nor rules of procedure framed for such cases, and they throw no light upon their organisation, further than as shewing the necessity of stringent exceptional rules to meet them. There can be no question that the party knowingly in the wrong should be condemned in all expenses which he wilfully occasions. He can be entitled to no favour; his appearance as a suitor is a false pretence, and he may be justly made to pay all the costs both of his adversary and of the public. The proper mode of dealing with such a case, however, does not appear to have any bearing upon the question now before us, which arises only where the law suit is, so to speak, an honest one, the occasion of which is produced by a justifiable doubt, either as to matter of law or matter of fact. It is true that at the outset the real cause of the law suit is not discovered, and it is presumed that the parties are acting honestly, and that the suit is a matter of necessity; but if it should appear in the progress of the suit that it is maintained from sinister motives, every court has a sufficient jurisdiction to prevent the abuse of its process, and to stop the proceedings, throwing the costs upon the delinquent party. If these means are not sufficient, and if such abuses are of so frequent occurrence as to become a public inconvenience, they might be further met with suitable penalties. But a strong line of demarcation should be drawn between the civil and criminal bearing of such conduct, and the proceedings of civil courts should not be made subservient to the repression of a public wrong. All suitors should not be subjected to loss and inconvenience in order to punish the misconduct of a few.

In applying the results of the above observations some difficulty may be found in fixing the limits between the functions of the Court and those of the suitor. The common rules of procedure make no practical distinction of this kind. The whole course of litigation from first to last is brought under the jurisdiction of the Court, and the Court intervenes more or less at every step for the preservation of formal order and accuracy. The actual work of litigation is divided between the Court and the suitors, with the view of most conveniently arriving at the final termination, but with little regard to their characteristic functions. For instance, it seems strictly the province of the Court to analyse the opposite statements of the suitors, to balance one against the other, to refer contradictions to trial, and to apply the law, to reason deliberate and decide. Yet in our system of procedure the analysis of the dispute, and the elimination of the issues, is effected by pleadings; and the costs and conduct of the pleadings are thrown wholly upon the suitors, who are also called upon to supply the Court with reasoning and argument. The suitors, in these respects, are made to perform in some degree the functions of the Court. On the other hand, the Court does much for the suitors; it assists in summoning the defendant and the witnesses; it executes the judgment and puts the party entitled in possession of his property. In these offices the Court seems to act rather as the agent and on behalf of the suitor, and it may be reasonably doubted whether the public should be called upon to pay for the assistance given to the suitor in supporting his own case, or for the costs occasioned by the obstinacy of a suitor in evading process. The case may be put thus: the suitor applies to the Court for the assistance of the public force; it may be said that as he wants it for his private affairs he should pay for it; but the embarrassment and doubt felt by the Court in answering his application, arising upon a consideration of the law and the facts, is peculiarly the difficulty of the Court, and the imperfections of the law or of the judges should be made good by the public. Where the law suit is an honest one the doubts of the judge are the chief difficulty and the chief expense; every good procedure gives facilities to suitors for presenting a case to the Court in an amicable manner with the fewest possible formalities and with little expense. Where the law suit is occasioned by the insolvency or unwillingness to pay of the defendant, it is employed merely as a process for the collection of debts, which though undisputed are often found to require a gentle pressure to enforce. In such cases the strictly judicial functions of the Court are seldom called into exercise, it being difficult if not impossible to extend litigation to a hearing, without a substantial ground of difference. There seems no reason why creditors should not be called upon to pay for the collection of their debts; but at the same time there seems no inherent anomaly in the country providing an establishment for that purpose. There are numerous associations for the protection of property and trade, to which the members contribute equally for the purpose of gratuitously providing legal assistance to those who suffer injury. The courts of justice may be regarded, in one point of view, as the instruments of an extended association for a similar object.

English jurisprudence in early times seems to have favoured the gratuitous administration of justice, but her later practice contradicts her early profession. The primitive conception of administering justice seems to have been unalloyed with mercenary motives. The emphatic declaration of Magna Charta nulli vendemus iusticiam, as delivered by the Crown on behalf of all courts of justice, seems to repudiate pecuniary advantage of all kinds, and to promise generally free access without fees. Sir E. Coke commenting on the Statute of Gloucester, which first gave costs to the plaintiff, says, that by this statute it may be collected that "justice was good cheap of ancient times, for in King Alfred's time all writs remedial were granted freely." The eagerness of the suitors themselves to propitiate justice with gifts may, perhaps, first have induced her to sell her favours; until at last she may have found herself compelled in self defence to exact fees impartially from both sides. It became a prerogative of the Crown as the fountain of justice to levy fees on law proceedings; and the profits of courts of justice were enumerated as a branch of the Royal Revenue. Manorial and inferior courts enjoyed a similar prerogative. The church lent its countenance to the system by exchanging things even holier than justice for fees. By degrees, fees were enacted by judges and officials on all possible occasions, and in many cases the form in which they were paid assumed the appearance, either by grant from the Crown or by prescription, of a perquisite to the individual receiver and was invested with the rights of private property, retaining no semblance of a tax paid to the State. In modern times a strong reaction has set in against this system, both in respect of the amount of fees and the mode of exaction.

With respect to the mode of exaction, fees in courts of justice are now universally recognised as rightfully levied only towards the general expenses of the court, and not for the private emolument of any individual official. With respect to the amount of fees charged, a sort of compromise seems to have been struck between the two contrary opinions that the courts should be paid for by the State and by the suitors. In all our courts both the State and the suitors contribute towards the payment of the expenses, though not according to any fixed general proportion. The scales of fees are from time to time revised and settled according to some sort of practical instinct determining what share should be cast upon one party and what upon the other. According to the plan of assessment adopted, the share of the expenses from the suitor is spread evenly over all the proceedings in which the courts or the offices intervene, so that the payments are made concurrently with the progress of the suit. No sort of fine is paid at the commencement or at the conclusion of the proceedings, but the fees are levied upon the particular step taken, and in return, as it were, for the particular services then rendered.

The contribution towards the costs of the court thus assessed upon the suitors is obviously irreconcilable in principle with the free administration of justice in the widest sense of the term. In the result, however, there may perhaps be a nearer approach to gratuitous justice than at first sight appears, the true state of things being in some degree disguised by the mode of assessment. As no exact distinction is made in our procedure between the separate functions of the court and of the suitor, so no such distinction appears in the assessment of fees, every step in the cause which must be taken with legal formality being subject to a fee. Court fees are charged for judgments and decrees, and also for trials, and the proceedings connected therewith; and these seem beyond all doubt to be assignable exclusively to the strictly judicial functions of the court, and, if the principles suggested above be correct, should be free and gratuitous. On the other hand, the fees paid upon other proceedings simply executive, which might be charged to the suitor, are probably far less in amount than the expenses incurred and the services rendered, so that while some portions of the proceedings may be paid for by the suitor too highly, or are such that he ought not to pay for at all, other portions he receives at too low a rate; and it is possible that in this interchange of offices the suitor may be the gainer, and on the whole may not be so heavily taxed as he appears to be. This, however, it must be confessed, is at present a matter of mere conjecture.

It would be interesting to know precisely what proportion of the expenses of our courts of justice is paid by the suitors, and what proportion by the public. The total amount of fees exacted in each court may be found in Mr. Redgrave's "The Judicial Statistics." They are, in the common law courts, £58,902; in the courts of chancery, £97,984; and in the county courts, £215,623. But it is remarkable that in this collection of judicial statistics, in other respects apparently so complete, no return is made of the expenses of the various courts. It would be difficult for a private inquirer to estimate these expenses, in consequence of the complex manner in which separate portions of them are charged upon various funds. If complete returns of the costs of the courts were comprised in the returns of judicial statistics, we should be enabled to say what portion of the expenses was paid by the country, and might then draw a comparison between the positions of the several courts with respect to the gratuitous administration of justice, and ascertain whether the suitors in one court are more favoured than those in another. The returns of Mr. Redgrave show that in proportion to the total sums in litigation, the Court of Chancery is far the most favoured tribunal, and the suitors are the worst off in the county courts, as might be expected from the smallness of the sums there in dispute. There is much reason for supposing that the courts stand in the same relative position with respect to the proportions of the cost of administering justice contributed by the suitors in each, and if so, there would seem to be no comparative grounds for granting further relief to the suitors in chancery, or for casting additional burdens on suitors in the county courts; but, on the contrary, justice would seem to require that they should all be placed as nearly as possible on the same footing, and that fees should either be diminished in the county courts, or increased in the courts of chancery. Notwithstanding that the county courts may still be more highly taxed comparatively than the courts of common law, and the courts of chancery, they have nevertheless been a great boon to the country, because they have introduced a scale of taxation more commensurate with the small amounts of the debts, and when complaint is made of the large sum these courts cost the country in comparison with the total value of the debts and property dealt with, it should be remembered that the amount in dispute is a very imperfect test of the cost of litigation. The complaints respecting these courts that they supply too great facilities for recovering debts, sufficiently answer themselves. The disuse of professional assistance for the collection of debts is a proof of the simplicity and efficiency of the procedure. The increase of lawful trades and businesses such as those of hawkers and loan societies, which could not be carried on without the aid of these courts, must be beneficial to the public. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive what evil can arise from the utmost facility being extended to the recovery of debts.

In the discussion which ensued upon this subject, several speakers referred to the important distinction between contentious law suits, such as were contemplated in the paper read, and quasi law suits, instituted merely for administrative business connected with property and other rights, such as the chief business in the courts of bankruptcy, some branches of Chancery jurisdiction, the business in the Probate Court, and some speakers included the Matrimonial Court. The general feeling seemed to be that law proceedings of this character, like mere conveyances, were not only open, but suitable for taxation, even for general purposes of the revenue. In other respects the tone of the discussion was, generally speaking, in accordance with the views taken by the reader.

THE HABEAS CORPUS IN ITALY.—The following letter from Count Cavour is in reply to a communication addressed to him by Mr. Edwin James, M.P., on the subject of the introduction of a law analogous to our "Habeas Corpus," and of a measure for the institution of a tribunal for immediate public investigation into all charges of a penal nature similar to that in use by our police magistracy:—"Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Turin, Nov. 29.—Dear Sir—I hasten to thank you for the letter in which you have suggested to me the introduction of the law of 'Habeas Corpus' into the system of Italian legislation. I am fully aware of the importance of that guarantee of individual liberty, and I beg to assure you that we have already made great advances in that direction. According to the present state of our law, every prisoner must within 24 hours be examined by some judicial authority, who, in pursuance of by no means arbitrary rules, either orders the immediate discharge of the accused, with or without bail, or continues his arrest, at the same time taking steps for placing him at once on his trial. Every illegal arrest, duly proved, subjects the functionary who shall have caused it to inquiry and punishment. At the same time, I quite acknowledge that the direct judicial action given by the law of 'Habeas Corpus' to persons illegally arrested assures more completely the liberty of the individual. I will at once bring the subject under the notice of my colleague, the Keeper of the Seals, within whose special province are all questions of penal legislation; and I have no doubt that he will propose to the Parliament to approximate as nearly as possible to the law of England in this matter. My colleague, Minghetti, is preparing a law which will confer most complete self-government on all the provinces and communes. In this matter, also, it is our endeavour to accomplish by other means the same results which England, the classical mother of all liberty, has already achieved. Allow me to renew to you, with thanks for the interest you take in the cause of Italy, the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.—C. CAVOUR. To Edwin James, Esq., M.P., &c."

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—This popular place of resort is likely to be the scene of great gaiety this Christmas. The movement for making Monday a general holiday has met with so much success that the company has determined to commence the usual Christmas festivities on that day instead of on Boxing-day, as hitherto. The centre transept and naves of the Palace have been beautifully decorated, and a variety of amusements will be provided for the visitors. Additional facilities for railway communication are now offered by the opening of the Victoria Station, as well as the line to Canterbury, which passes through the Crystal Palace Station. The Palace will be open as usual on Christmas day itself from nine till dusk.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, DECEMBER 29, 1860.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Lord Chancellor's dissertation upon long judgments, and upon the importance of having them written in complicated cases, has given rise to a discussion in the morning journals of a more animated character than is generally produced by extra-judicial observations in the Court of Chancery. It is not often, however, that a Lord Chancellor takes to task one of his judicial subordinates for the manner and style in which he delivers his decisions—decisions, moreover, which are in themselves the subject of general admiration. The Times, in a leading article upon the subject, while admitting the distinguished judicial ability of Vice-Chancellor Wood, agrees in the main with what Lord Campbell has said, and finds no fault with the occasion or the manner in which the lecture was delivered. The Daily News, on the other hand, is of opinion that not only should every judge be permitted, without observation, to deliver his decisions in a manner most consistent with his own habits of mind, and, therefore, most likely to be conducive to a good result; but that the Lord Chancellor—having no right by virtue of his office, and being hardly qualified by reason of his comparative inexperience in the business of the Court of Chancery—ought not to make a public statement which must necessarily be hurtful to the distinguished judge against whom it is directed. It has also been remarked that extra-judicial observations of such a character, by one member of the court upon another, are likely to lead to unseemly personal dissensions in open court, and, therefore, that they tend to interfere with that judicial calm which is essential to the even course of justice. We have not thought it right or becoming in us to offer any opinion whatever upon either the right or the good taste of the Lord Chancellor, in publicly making the observations which have been the subject of so much comment. We believe, however, that the general feeling of both branches of the profession is opposed to an over elaboration of judgments, and is in favour of having them committed to writing by the judge, in important cases—where it is desirable that the decision should be expressed with that caution and preciseness of language which is sometimes necessary in discussing questions of law, and which is scarcely ever attainable by extempore speakers.

Mr. Henry Thring has been appointed to succeed Mr. Coulson as parliamentary draftsman to the Home Office—at least, such is the form of the announcement which has appeared in an official journal. There is no intimation whether this appointment is to be considered as indicating an adherence on the part of the Government to the hap-hazard, unsystematic, but most expensive, procedure which it has adopted for many years past. It is well known that although Mr. Coulson nominally had the duty of preparing the Bills not only of the Home Office but of those of most of the other departments of Government, the greater part of the work was in fact done by other draftsmen specially employed for the purpose. Thus to Mr. Thring himself we are indebted for the numerous joint stock companies Acts and Bills for the last five years; and if it were necessary to go through a list of other important measures proposed to Parliament during the same time, by members of the Government, with the preparation of which Mr. Coulson had notoriously nothing to do, we might enumerate the great majority of Bills of any importance before Parliament during that period. We shall content ourselves by reference—merely for the sake of illustration—to Lord Chelmsford's Debtor and Creditor Bill, the numerous Bills relating to land transfer, introduced by Lord Brougham, Sir Richard Bethell, and Sir Hugh Cairns, and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill of last session. If, therefore, the old system, or rather want of system, is to be adhered to, the probability is, that Mr. Thring will have less to do in the preparation of Bills for the Government, now that he is the official draftsman than he had when he was employed as occasion required. We have long urged upon the Government the necessity for greater attention to the machinery of legislation, and the vast importance of adopting a good system in the preparation of Bills. We are convinced that indirectly the consequent gain to the country would be very large, while the direct saving would not be inconsiderable. It seems to be generally felt on all hands, that something must be done for the improvement of legislation by private Bills, and various proposals have been made upon this subject, with which our readers are familiar. We now allude to the appointment of Mr. Thring merely for the purpose of expressing our hope that the Government do not intend to adhere to the miserable system which has hitherto proved the source of infinite embarrassment and vexation to lawyers, and, in addition to these, of no little disgust, and of very great expense, to the public. Plans of reform without number have emanated from commissions, parliamentary committees, and private individuals; and surely amendment in this respect is not so impracticable as to be considered hopeless by the executive. Not only the profession but the general public will, therefore, be bitterly disappointed if it should turn out to be the fact that, after all that has been said to the Government upon this important subject, there is no intention at present to attempt any improvement; but that, in the teeth of all that has been written and said upon the subject, the old and expensive system of irresponsibility and hap-hazard, with all its baneful results, is still to be continued in full play.

We present our readers, this week, with a Sheet Almanack for the new year. It is intended to be useful in lawyers' offices, and is embellished by a handsome woodcut of the New Library of the Inner Temple, which has just been completed. The first stone of this building was laid by the late Sir Fortunatus Dwaris, on the 15th of August, 1858. The following description of it is taken from a recent number of The Builder:—"The principal floor—the library proper, which may be called 96 feet long, including the oriel, 42 feet wide, and 63 feet in height, to the under-side of the ridge, is covered with a hammer-beam roof, after the fashion of that in Westminster Hall. In fact, when it is looked at from the south end, the window in the north end, not seen in our view, being also very like the great window in Westminster, the likeness is disagreeably striking. The library is warmed with Perkins' hot-water pipes, and the floor is laid with cement, in stone margins. The side windows and that in the northern end are filled with stained glass, by Messrs. Ward. The latter, containing the arms of Templars, is a rich piece of colour. Below the library are two stories, introduced as a commercial speculation, with more advantage in a pecuniary point of view than to the appearance of the building externally. These chambers are not, as is generally supposed, for the temporary reception of persons overcome in the library by the somnific influence of study; but will be let to any parties who wish to reside or carry on business in the Temple. Mr. H. R. Abraham is the architect, Mr. Geo. Myers the contractor. The carving was executed by Mr. Ruddick. The building is wholly of Bath stone externally; and the cost, including the book-cases, will be something under £13,000."

The admirers of Mr. Edwin James had the satisfaction a few weeks ago, of seeing him portrayed at full length in the dress of a bandit chief, in the Illustrated London News; there was something of genius in that effort to intensify the common place. About the same time they had the pleasure of perusing a production of his pen taken up at some interval when his hand had leisure from the sword or the pistols which decorated his ample belt. That celebrated epistle breathed a military fervour which will not soon be forgotten. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Marylebone Institution in Edward-street, Portman-square, should have asked Mr. E. James to deliver a lecture descriptive of his campaigns; although, perhaps, the public were hardly prepared to find that Mr. E. James was ready, on so short a notice, to enlighten the world on "The Revolutions of Europe, their Origin and Results!"

No less, however, is the title under which he has announced his lecture, which is to come off on Thursday week. The topic affords more room for comment than we can spare in this narrow compass, or probably than Mr. James will find that he can well manage in the course of an hour or two at the Marylebone Institution.

TAXATION OF SUITORS AND LEGAL FINANCE.

The great measure of concentrating the law courts and offices, now happily about to be accomplished, will necessitate a review of two subjects, each most important to the profession and its clients; and each demanding much more comprehensive and scientific treatment than it has hitherto received. These two subjects are—first, the taxation of the suitors; and secondly, the banking and financial arrangements of all the judicial establishments superior and local.

The solicitors, as the keepers of the suitor's purse and accounts, are the persons best able to form correct opinions on these two subjects. Their interest is identical with that of the clients. As it was well put at one of the annual meetings of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Society a year or two ago—"If we are honest, it is our duty to protect our clients from over taxation; but even if we were rogues, it would be our interest to let nobody rob them but ourselves." As the body of solicitors will probably take a serious part in the discussion of these two subjects, which we conceive must ensue on the passing of the Concentration of Courts Bills, we propose in this and some future articles to go over the leading points of each of them.

The first of these subjects involves the following questions:—1st. How far suitors should be taxed if at all? 2nd. Whether every law-tax now levied has not now become a state tax, and one, therefore, which should be voted annually by Parliament, and form part of the annual budget, and be entirely removed from the management of the Judges? 3rd. The incidence of the tax, and whether it should not rather be a property than a poll-tax? 4th. Should not the method of collecting the tax be one for all courts (as it is now for two or three only), e.g., by a law stamp as in Chancery or the Probate Court, and what method is the best? 5th. Should not the supervision of this branch of taxation, and the preparation of the annual budget upon it, be entrusted to some one office of Government in connection with the Treasury, so as to insure Parliamentary responsibility for a due, uniform, and well-considered action in the matter? And 6th. Whether the civil judicial statistics, now for the first time wisely issued by the Government, ought not to contain an annual summary and balance-sheet—a map, as it were, of the whole area of legal taxation and finance?

The second of these two great subjects—viz., the banking transactions and commercial finance of every court—involves the following questions:—1st. As the transactions of courts under this head are not (to use the expression of one of the witnesses on the late commission) vital to the existence of property as the decisions on questions of title and right are,—should there not always be some profit to the State for discharging, through its courts, these functions? 2nd. If so, should not this profit go in aid of any taxes which may have to be imposed for the maintenance of the judicial establishment? 3rd. However wise it may be to keep separate courts of law, equity, bankruptcy, and so on, ought not there to be a fusion of the finance offices of all the courts, and should not one consolidated banking office do the work for all the courts? 4th. Would it not be better to depute this work to the Bank of England; and at any rate, is it prudent to keep up such an establishment as that of the Chancery Accountant-General? 5th. Would it not be wise to establish a state deposit account, and to receive, at a low rate of interest, monies paid into court, as stakeholders, instead of compelling temporary investments in the funds, or the entire loss of interest? 6th. How far other offices and establishments of the State cannot be called in aid of the judicial establishment; e.g., whether such small sums as county courts have to receive by way of deposit could not be received by the Money Order Office? 7th. The forms of monetary orders, and method of court account keeping (now diverse throughout the law), also require full investigation.

These are some of the points which require consideration in any discussion on the "Taxation of Suitors." Our last number, however, contained a very lengthy paper, with that title, read before the Juridical Society, by Mr. S. Martin Leake. The subject is a great and most shamefully neglected one; but the paper we refer to, instead of being the hearty outpouring of indignation at such neglect, was more like the set thesis of one who wrote on it because he must write on something. The only opinions he quoted in his paper are those of two Judges. These opinions were successfully combated by others in the very report which he had before him; and such counter-views should have been in common justice also stated. Probably Mr. Leake was not aware of the three important reports of the Committee of the House of Commons on Fees of Suitors (1847, Par. paper, No. 643; 1848, Par. paper, 158; and 1849, Par. paper, 559), or of the article in the first volume of the Law Review on the Legal Budget, which gave rise to those Committees. Had he known of them, he could hardly have reconciled himself to omit all mention of the fact that it is mainly to the efforts of solicitors (now extended over the last fifteen years) that the subject owes its original investigation, and the elucidation it has since received.

The Juridical Society, we believe, does not admit a solicitor in its ranks. This may be all very well, but, in our opinion, the bar and the Judges do not deal in the way that such a body should deal with the rightful claims of solicitors to priority of action and discovery on some questions of juridical science. The last Chancery commission was almost entirely a bar commission. The Lord Chancellor refused to put a single solicitor upon it. The great question which the Commissioners dealt with was the abolition of the assistant judicial office of Master in Chancery; and a truly great question it was. But neither in their report, nor in the appendix of evidence, did the Commissioners mention the receipt from the Law Institution of a full, thoroughly detailed, report, signed by twenty-nine of the most eminent solicitors practising in the Equity Courts, proposing to them the very measure which they ultimately advised (see Par. paper, 1852, No. 216). Still less did they state, as that paper points out, that "in 1841 the same view in all material respects was advanced by a solicitor, at that time actively engaged in attempting to promote Equity Reforms in papers published in the Legal Observer, in January and February, 1841, where the question is discussed with great ability, and the necessity of the change established.

We do not call this sort of work plagiarism—but neither do we call it altogether gentlemanly dealing. We shall have on a future occasion to mention Mr. Leake's paper, and will therefore only add, that while it professes to be a paper on the "Taxation of Suitors," it deals only with the single question suggested above as the first query under our first head; all the rest he ignores.

The Chancery Commission never completed its labours, but died, we suppose, of inanition—certainly not of repletion. It never got so far as to consider the question of the Accountant General's Office and the Banking department; upon which question the Solicitors' Report contained some most important and able suggestions, touching on many of the points above mentioned. On all or any of those points we now ask for practical communications from the profession, it being clear that the time for action is near at hand.

THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38).

The observations of Q. upon the criticism of Lord St. Leonards' Act to further amend the law of property, which appeared ante, p. 44, require to be considered in somewhat of extended detail. The article to which Q. alludes, together with the very practical paper of Mr. Johnson, ante, p. 13, may be considered as a tolerably complete commentary on the present law of judgments. The present observations, therefore, being rather supplementary than essential to a general view of this complicated branch of law, may best follow the order of Q.'s pointed comments.

The recent Act contains no provision for the re-registration of judgments or executions; that is, it does not render re-registration imperative, as the analogous quinquennial re-registration of judgments is directed and rendered imperative by the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11. But one registration must not be necessarily presumed to exhaust the statute. A judgment must be revived every twenty years to bind the conuzor, and re-registered every five years to bind a purchaser from the conuzor; but it might be revived and re-registered continuously if the conuzee should so choose. Registration is proscribed as the indispensable concomitant of execution; as often, consequently, as an execution can be issued, so often may the statutory incident of this registration be attached to it. Therefore, it appears both on principle and analogy that an execution may be issued and renewed every three months, and registered as often as it is issued. If the Act provided that all executions upon the judgment should be void after three months, unless re-registered, just as the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, s. 4 enacted that judgments should, as to purchasers, be void after five years, unless re-registered, the case would be different. But, as the Act is worded, a power of renewing this charge every three months appears to remain in the conuzee; the Act, also, implicitly, as it would seem, directing that the writ of execution should have three months to run. The Act is a specimen of legislation by wholesale and inference—a sort of argumentative enactment. Being the product of the Legislature, we must assume that it enacts whatever is necessary to render all its provisions operative to their full extent. Of course, the Act, as also these observations, apply only to the case of purchasers. As to the conuzor and his volunteer representatives, the old law remains intact, as it does also as regards judgments entered up before the 23rd July, 1860, even as to purchase. A step under the last statute—such as the issuing and registering an execution—does not, if the sheriff return nil, restore the creditor to the rights which a judgment creditor had before the 23rd July, 1860. The judgment, of course, continues, as to the conuzor, unaffected by the recent Act, and, therefore, affects his after-acquired property. As to Q.'s third query, an execution could not, it would appear, affect property not in the county of the sheriff to whom the writ is directed. In reply to Q.'s 4th query, the issuing and registering a fieri facias would not affect a purchaser of freeholds. The Act was not intended to enlarge the powers, or increase the remedies, of a judgment creditor; and it reduces freehold to the nature of leasehold estates, but not to the nature of goods, in relation to judgments. Q. rightly considers that the article to which he refers recommends the constitution of judgments as plenary incumbering assurances, such as the Irish judgment mortgages are. This would be a step in the consolidation of the law. Codification is not grateful to the British mind; it is too radical and too much like theory. But if a well-defined statutory mode of incumbering land prevailed, it would tend to a simple form of assurances in ordinary cases of conveyance as distinguished from settlements, which always requires varied limitations. The laws that we already have need not be entirely cast away in any process of legal fusion; on the contrary, the sternest rules of the feudal common law may be accepted as a basis for a more elaborate superstructure, even as the grim lines and angles of the mathematician afford an outline for the embellishments of the painter.

Both registration and notice must concur, to render either of any avail as against purchasers. The register of judgments, however, is usually searched; and a search amounts to notice. This may, however, be avoided; and can only militate against the value of the estate to the purchaser when he goes himself into the market to sell the same estate, a contract for the sale of which he cannot then enforce upon an unwilling vendee who, in this particular transaction, either by search of the register, or otherwise, gets notice of unsatisfied judgments against the first vendor. Such a title cannot be enforced upon an unwilling purchaser, as explained ante, p. 13 (vid. Freer v. Hesse, 4 De G. M. & G. 495).

The observations of Q. are calculated to attract attention to the practical results of the recent Act, which has, indeed, accumulated registrations, although these, without notice, are inoperative, and have hardly any operation but in taxing borrowers, who have to pay ultimately for all expenses attending the securities for their loans.

The letter of W. R. H., which appeared in our columns last week, depicts in a forcible manner the mischief which has resulted from the indefinite character given to judgments by the various legislative experiments, to which they have been subjected. He concurs in opinion with Mr. Johnson, to whose paper we have before referred, in stating that "if it is right so severely to restrict judgment claims, as is done by the late Act, it is equally right, and incomparably more convenient, to relieve purchasers and mortgagees altogether from them." With this opinion, taken as a whole, we concur. The extinction of judgment-charges upon land would be better than a state of the law, which tends, by reason of its numerous and apparently provident enactments regarding judgments, to dissipate unduly the apprehensions of creditors, while its chief effect is to tax the landowner by the litigation which it provokes.

But, while we concur in the opinion of Mr. Johnson, W. R. H., and, we believe, the public generally, that the total abolition of the statutes constituting judgments a charge on land would be an amendment of the existing law; we must, at the same time, say, that such an amputation is not the character of reform that we prefer to see carried out. Landowners will encumber their land, and perhaps no mode of doing so should be prohibited. On the contrary, when a particular form of incumbering land has prevailed from a very remote period down to the present time, and has, consequently, been often the subject of judicial decision, we must assume, that the legal nature of such incumbrances would be by this time clearly defined, if that process had not been disturbed by frequent interpositions of the legislature. The point at which we should begin to cut off the excrescences caused by legislation, rather than a total eradication of the stock itself, is, as appears to us, the object that should engage our attention. The Statute of Frauds has been said to have cost hundreds of thousands to suitors; yet though they have been, by reason of the ambiguity of the enactment, virtually taxed for the settlement of the law by judicial decisions, we should not wish to see that statute now repealed; as such a step would not compensate the victims of the statute, and would only, perhaps, render us open to an equally severe oppression from the ambiguity of the substituted enactment. We should prefer, therefore, the consolidation of the law of judgments to the extinction of all legal definition of these acts of record as charges upon land; but either alternative would be better than the present state of this branch of the law, which keeps judgments "hovering over the land," sometimes alighting successfully on their prey, and as often prevented from doing so. An additional reason for the preservation of this mode of incumbering land arises from the concise nature of the charge. A judgment is entered upon a cognovit at a small expense, and yet, by means of statutory incidents, it can operate as effectively as an expensive deed of mortgage. If, after the passing of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the laws relating to judgments had been left unaltered, they would by this time have become a common, because the most effectual mode of incumbering land, and so, perhaps, would to some extent have superseded mortgages and other species of incumbrances. No one, surely, will deny, that such a consummation would be a boon to the creditor for its security, to the debtor for its cheapness and freedom from liability to litigation, and even to the purchaser from its certainty and the consequent necessity of its being satisfied prior to his payment of the purchase-money. The existing ambiguity of the nature of these charges must entail, in every case of purchase, a special inconvenience upon professional men, who, as W. R. H. suggests, have to balance the inconveniences of the risk and the expense, one against the other. The seller and borrower, indeed, as a general rule, ultimately pay for the expense of making out title. All facilities, therefore, for deducing title, granted by the Legislature increase pro tanto the value to the owner of the estate for sale, and are, virtually, equivalent to the increase of its acreage. The price will remain unaffected; but the owner will not have to spend so much of it in making out title, as he is obliged to do at present. After the bargain is concluded, a net saving can, of course, in any state of the laws relating to title, be effected by the diligence of the purchaser's solicitor; and although the general incidence of law taxes, whether imposed directly as stamps, or indirectly, as consequent upon a faulty state of the law, is upon vendors and borrowers, as we have stated, it cannot at the same time be denied, that the purchaser does not invariably look far beyond the amount of purchase-money, and has frequently to pay what he had never calculated upon as his share of the expense.

We cannot concur with W. R. H. in the next proposition which he advances—viz., that if judgments should be charges upon one species of property, they should be charges upon every other kind of possessions. Indeed, our correspondent appears to err in his implied assumption—viz., that judgments are not charges upon goods and chattels.

Judgments are charges upon this class of possessions in the hands of the owners, and would be allowed by the Legislature to be charges upon goods even after sale in market overt, only that the general and paramount claims of commerce would be thus disregarded. The lien of a judgment upon property is a public advantage; but when it accidentally conflicts with a greater good, it is then disregarded in comparison with stronger claims. There is, therefore, no foundation for this part of the argument of W. R. H. Few would advocate the necessity of an action being instituted upon judgments entered upon cognovita. It would be a useless tax upon borrowers, who, as we cannot too often state, are the parties who ultimately pay for all means of enforcing the securities for their debts.

It is not, of course, desirable, that trade in land should be so entirely free, as that the claims of the creditors and incumbrancers of the vendor should be disregarded. Unless this be done, however, there is no use in proscribing judgments. A judgment, indeed, as W. R. H. states, does not operate as a check, at least a sufficient one, upon fraudulent debtors. Nevertheless, it is better to render the check effectual, than wholly to remove it. We should be disposed, contrary to W. R. H.'s opinion, to say, that very many estates are burdened with judgments; but there are no greater objections to judgments as charges upon land, than to incumbrances by mortgage, to which we desire to see judgments assimilated, and, consequently, as a cheaper mode of creating incumbrances, preferred. We have considered the letter of W. R. H. chiefly in its relation to general principles; and as the law of judgments now stands, his observations are pointed and useful.

It is to be hoped, however, that the law of judgments will be amended, and that, instead of being abolished, they will be constituted a standard mode of incumbering land.

The Courts, Appointments, Promotions, Vacancies, &c.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, GUILDHALL.

SECOND COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice CROMPTON and a common jury.)

Dec. 21.—Kain v. Mahood.—At the conclusion of this case (in which a juror had been withdrawn,) a juror having expressed a wish to give the plaintiff his costs, Mr. Justice Crompton said, "it is very wrong for juries to think of costs at all. They are bound to give damages according to the circumstances. Costs sometimes follow the damages, and sometimes they do not, and sometimes they depend on the discretion of the judge. Juries ought to remember that they swear by their oaths to decide according to the evidence, and if they make the damages follow the costs they do not attend to their oaths."

Dec. 22.—Solomon v. Noon.—In this case the defendant had pleaded a tender, which brought from the judge the following caution:—

The learned JUDGE stated that Lord Abinger, 50 years ago, had said much about the difficulty of proving a tender, and he (Mr. Justice Crompton) had always told young men in pleaders' chambers never to plead a tender, but always to advise a defendant to pay the money into court. This would at once remove the difficulty of proving a tender; and if the plaintiff did not take the money out of court the amount would be deducted from the verdict by the jury. He feared that the only reason why money was not paid into court was to save a few shillings at an early part of the proceedings.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Dec. 20.—While some arrangements were being made for the settlement of a cause, a special juror addressed the learned judge, and expressed a hope that his lordship would have some consideration for himself and brother jurors.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE replied,—I have from the very commencement of the sittings endeavoured to suit the convenience of both suitors and jurors; but I may tell you, sir, that the distinction between common and special jurors will shortly be done away with, and instead of being summoned for certain cases you will have to attend from the beginning of the sittings to the end.

ASSIZES,—LIVERPOOL.

(CROWN COURT. Before Mr. Justice KEATING.)

Dec. 21.—Previous to the commencement of the trial of a man named Niel, and others, Mr. Scott, who appeared as counsel for one of the prisoners, addressing the Court, said that he thought it his duty to call his lordship's attention to a circumstance which had come to his knowledge with regard to the prisoner Niel. It appeared from statements made by that prisoner, which were confirmed by the officers of the gaol, that some person representing himself as an attorney, had obtained access to the prisoner, and had induced him to hand him over such money as the prisoner possessed, for the purpose of instructing Mr. Scott to defend him. That money Mr. Scott had never received, nor, indeed, had any communication been made to him on behalf of the prisoner, who then stood undefended.—His Lordship inquired whether the person referred to by the prisoner was in reality an attorney, as, if so, it was quite clear he would not long remain so.—Mr. Higgin, who appeared for the prosecution, replied, that he believed the person in question could be identified, and that he was not an attorney, but an attorney's clerk.—His Lordship said, he was glad for the honour of the profession to learn that the person who had been guilty of so atrocious a crime was not an attorney, and he was quite satisfied that when that person, whoever he might be, stood at that bar at the next assizes, as he had no doubt he would, he would receive the punishment which his offence so richly deserved.

Mr. Henry Thring, conveyancer, of Lincoln's-inn, has been appointed Parliamentary draughtsman to the Home-office, in the room of Mr. Walter Coulson, Q.C., deceased.

Mr. John Jones, of Dolgelly, in the county of Merioneth, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

EQUITY.

WILL—IMPLIED GIFT TO EXECUTOR.

Juler v. Juler, M. R. 9, W. R. 61.

Previous to 11 Geo. 4, & 1 Will. 4, c. 40, executors were not precluded from claiming by virtue of their office a beneficial interest in the undisposed of personal estate of their testator; on the contrary, unless such a presumption were expressly negatived by the will, the executors were entitled to the beneficial interest. By that Act, however, the rule of law in this respect was reversed. Reciting that testators by their wills frequently appointed executors without making any express disposition of their personal estate; that executors so appointed became by law entitled to the whole residue of such personal estate; and that courts of equity had so far followed the law as to hold such executors to be entitled to retain such residue for their own use, unless it appeared to have been their testator's intention to exclude them from the beneficial interest therein, it was enacted that when any person should die after the 1st September, 1830, having by his will appointed an executor, such executor should be deemed by courts of equity to be a trustee for the next of kin in respect of any residue not expressly disposed of, unless it should appear by the will that he was intended to take such residue beneficially. The Act does not affect the rights of executors, where no person is entitled—where there is no next of kin. Except in the latter case, the effect of the statute is, therefore, as we have said, to reverse the rule which was previously observed by courts of equity; and according to the decision in the present case, the Court will not make any presumption in favour of an executor, unless where the will contains explicit evidence of the testator's intention to confer a beneficial interest on the executor. "What the statute meant to say," said Sir John Romilly, M.R., "was that the burden of proof lay on the executor to prove distinctly, from the testamentary instrument, that he was to take a beneficial interest." It appears that it is not enough that the will contains no other gift from which a general presumption in favour of the executor's claim might be supposed to arise; and the executor, therefore, in this case—although the only gift was to him—was held to be a trustee for the next of kin of the testator.

The cases in which the effect of a gift to executors has been considered, have nearly always been those in which the gift was to the executors not of the testator, but of some other person who was himself intended, if living at the death of the testator, to take beneficially under the will.—As to which see Hayes & Jarman's Concise Forms, 5th ed., pp. 161-163 (n).

COMMON LAW.

TENANT HOLDING OVER—ACTION FOR DOUBLE RENT.

Swinfen v. Bacon, 9 W. R., Exch., 105.

This was an action arising incidentally out of the celebrated case of Swinfen v. Swinfen, and was brought by the widow and devisee of the testator against one of the tenants of the Swinfen estate, who had retained possession (after receiving due notice to quit), in the interest and at the request of the heir-at-law, by whom the validity of the will was disputed. The chief point of interest, however, in the present case arises from its affording a useful reading of the statutable provision, under which the claim to recover "double rent" for the time during which the tenant so held over, was brought. This provision is that of 4 Geo. 2, c. 28, s. 1, which enacts that in case any tenant for life, or years, or other person claiming under or by collusion with such tenant shall wilfully hold over, after the determination of the term, and after demand made, and notice in writing given by him to whom the remainder or reversion of the premises shall belong for delivering the possession thereof, such person so holding over or keeping the other out of possession, shall pay for the time he detains the lands at the rate of double their yearly value. Now, the gist of the action given by this enactment lies in the word "wilfully;" but, in the present case, the tenant held over bona fide, believing that the premises belonged to a person other than the person from whom he had received notice to quit. And the Court of Exchequer unanimously were of opinion that to such a holding over, the enactment did not apply. To this result they were led by considering the principle of the Act and the evil it was passed to remedy. Its object was, to give landlords an additional safeguard against the danger of their tenants putting them at defiance, and retaining the premises against the will of the person entitled to their possession. In some of the cases upon the Act the expression used by the courts is, that the action lies only where there is clear "contumacy" on the part of the tenant; not if he holds over believing, on reasonable grounds, that he himself is entitled, or that another person has the right for whom he holds it against the person really entitled.

The Lord Chief Baron remarked in his judgment that "the very few instances recorded in which landlords have availed themselves of the assistance of this Act, is a very strong and gratifying proof of the general kindness and forbearance of landlords towards their tenants." This may be true enough. But the eulogium thus passed upon landlords is open to the obvious remark that it would have been just as easy to have ascribed the deficiency of cases upon this provision to the "general fairness and regard to their bargains, evinced by tenants towards their landlords." The certainty which the statute secures of having to pay a considerable penalty for the indulgence of mere obstinacy may be suggested as, perhaps, a more probable solution of the rarity of cases, than any extraordinary forbearance on the part either of landlord or tenant.

COUNTY COURT LAW—JURISDICTION—COSTS UNDER 15 & 16 Vict., c. 54, s. 4.

Avis v. Orchard, 9 W. R., Exch., 106; Warman v. Hallam, ib., B. C. 108.

These are two cases which should be noted up in books of county court practices—the first of them turning upon a principle of law; the other merely on a rule of practice.

In Avis v. Orchard, the question was, whether a contract is divisible? that is to say, can certain acts towards the making of a contract be done on one day, and the remaining acts to complete the contract, on a subsequent day; so as to fix the foreign district within which a plaintiff for its breach must be levied: it being required under 9 & 10 Vict., c. 95, s. 60, that the "whole cause of action" must arise within the district within which the trial is. In the present case, there had been a verbal agreement for the purchase of a horse (which could not have been sued on by reason of the statute of frauds) in district A, on a certain day, and on the next day an agreement for the purchase of the same animal in district B; which last transaction complied with the statute, and comprised different terms from those entered into on the preceding day. The plaintiff was levied in district B, and the Court of Exchequer (the question arising upon a rule which had been obtained for a prohibition) held that it was rightly so brought. For, said the Court, "a contract is one entire act or thing; it is incapable of being divided so as to say that it consisted of two matters—one of which passed on one day, and another on another day." And again, "this is an endeavour to carry the cases, holding that the whole cause of action must arise within the county court district, in certain cases, further than they have ever yet been carried by splitting the contract; this cannot be done—a contract is indivisible."

Warman v. Hallam was an application by a plaintiff (who had recovered in an action of debt, less than £20) for costs, under 15 & 16 Viet. c. 54, s. 4. On the argument of the rule nisi it appeared that a prior application had been made and refused at chambers, though the affidavits in support of the rule made no allusion to the circumstance.

Upon this the Court observed, that the application should have been made, if at all, by way of appeal from the decision at chambers, not by way of substantive application; and that, in consequence of this, the Court had nothing before them to enable them to decide whether the judge at chambers had been right or wrong in his decision.

Had due attention in this case been paid to the decision in Heath v. Nesbitt (11 Mee & W. 669), it would have avoided the defeat of the application—at all events on the ground on which the rule for costs was in fact discharged.

COPYHOLD MORTGAGE.

Can you or any of your readers inform me the proper mode of discharging copyhold property which has been enfranchised, from a mortgage created prior to the enfranchisement by means of a conditional surrender, upon which admission has not been taken? Does not the 46th section of the Copyhold Act of 1852 make necessary a deed of reconveyance?

V. C. WOOD AND THE CHANCELLOR.

I am sorry to observe that you do not in your leading article of to-day even express regret that the Lord Chancellor should have made such uncalled-for remarks on the most honoured of our Vice-Chancellors. Even if it were better to have had the judgment written, still such observations were uncalled for, unnecessary, and evidence of very bad taste.

The Lord Chancellor cannot but have inflicted pain on the most excellent of judges.

PROFESSIONAL REMUNERATION.

Referring to "Hints to the Profession" in your Journal of the 8th, on the subject of our remuneration, I have frequently wondered why this subject has not more engaged the attention of the Law Society. The present system of making our charges is alike vexatious and annoying to the solicitor and the client. It is humiliating to us to have to state the subject matter of a letter to warrant a charge of five shillings; and to tell a long story as the subject matter of a charge of 6s. 8d. or 13s. 4d., to say nothing of the waste of time—first, in concocting the entry in the day-book; the accountant's time in posting it; the subsequent settlement of the bill for delivery; the copying it for delivery; and the copy for the fair bill book as delivered. A large proportion of our clients have not the patience to read through many folio pages to see how these trumpery charges have been earned, and regard the bill as a more or less ingenious manufacture.

Most men who are contemplating the purchase or sale of an estate, or the raising a loan on mortgage, naturally desire to ascertain beforehand what will be the cost. The only answer we can give under the present system is, "We cannot possibly say." That is not satisfactory. I have seen the plan suggested of a per centage fee, and I have not seen any sound objection to that mode of remuneration; which would, as it appears to me, be satisfactory to all parties. It seems to be in actual operation in Scotland. I had occasion recently to inquire the mode of remuneration adopted in Edinburgh, on a client proposing to make an investment on a mortgage of an estate in Scotland. Not then being conversant either with the Scotch law, or the professional practice in Scotland, I wrote to solicitors there for some information on the subject. I was informed that the law charges for conveyances and mortgages there were computed for a commission of, so far as I remember, 1 per cent. in the one case, and 1½ per cent. in the other. Now, though such commissions may not, in some particular cases, be equivalent to our ordinary scale of charge in detail, yet, when the saving of time and trouble inseparable from the existing practice, the avoidance of all civil and dissatisfaction of clients on charges they cannot duly estimate, and the comparative freedom and satisfaction with which they would engage in such transactions when they could exactly compute the cost beforehand, are considered, I am convinced the change would, on the whole be a beneficial one to the profession.

A SOLICITOR OF NEARLY 50 YEARS' STANDING.

Review.

Personal History of Lord Bacon; from Unpublished Papers.

By WILLIAM HEPWORTH DIXON, of the Inner Temple.
John Murray, Albemarle-street.

Some years since, the present Lord Chancellor, then holding a less distinguished judicial position than that which he now fills, delivered a memorable judgment that seriously concerned the reputation of one who, renowned as a philosopher, was also eminent as a lawyer and a statesman. The case, which for some time appeared to be closed to discussion by his lordship's emphatic decision, has been re-opened; and by a higher and final court of appeal the adverse judgment is undergoing reversal. From the nature and constitution of the court the rehearing of the cause will still occupy many months; for although the judges of the tribunal, amounting in all to many thousands, and even tens of thousands, usually sit, each by himself, in solitary separation, and very rarely indeed attend to public business in numbers exceeding three at a time, every one of these important functionaries must examine the arguments and evidence of each case brought before their bench, and separately record his opinion upon it, before the ultimate order of reversal or confirmation can be declared. We need not add that we are alluding to the court of public opinion, and to the renewed discussion of the charges under which Lord Bacon's fame has long suffered, and upon which Lord Campbell, in his "Lives of the Chancellors," gave judgment against the accused, in terms that, to speak of his lordship's conduct with moderation, at least evince no wish to regard leniently the failings of a noble mind.

The vindicator of Bacon's reputation published not long since in the columns of a literary journal the outlines of the arguments which in his "Personal History of Lord Bacon," he has filled up with such a bulk of new evidence, and hitherto unpublished documents, and such a wealth of historic illustration, that the original articles and the present work bear only a faint family likeness to each other. A legal journal is not the place for a critical examination of all that Mr. Hepworth Dixon has to say, and all he has made known, with regard to the domestic fortunes and political labours of his hero. But that which relates to Bacon the lawyer especially concerns every member of his profession. Elsewhere we should willingly admit that to purge the author of the "Novum Organum" of the stains that have for centuries blemished his moral character in the eyes of the world, was a grander achievement than only to prove him an upright judge. But here we have nothing to do with the problems and paradoxes of morality. For all we in these columns care, Pope's line may be true or false; and Bacon may or may not have been "The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind." Either way, we care not. But as lawyers, we have a peculiar feeling of interest in an endeavour—and, what is more, a successful endeavour, to prove—that Francis Bacon did not corrupt the fountains of justice. And with especial force does this interest assert itself during the perusal of Mr. Dixon's pages, where the proofs of Bacon's judicial purity are the result of a careful search into the professional and social usages of the legal profession during the reigns of James the First, Elizabeth, and their immediate predecessors in the throne of England.

On both sides Bacon was favourably placed by birth for success at the bar, and in the arena of the House of Commons. The son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, he was, in his infancy, introduced to the ruling powers of the court, and ere he had ceased to lip paid daily compliments to Queen Elizabeth, who, in return for his pretty homage, was wont to call him her little Lord Keeper. Through his mother he inherited associations that, to more pliant men, would have been the key to rapid success. Lady Ann Bacon, the Olympia Morata of Elizabeth's court, was one of five sisters—daughters of that fine old scholar who drugged King Edward with Latin, Sir Anthony Cook, of Giddy Hall, in Essex—all the five, pious and learned, as so many muses, but, unlike the muses, all were made happy wives: Mildred, by Lord Burghley; Ann, by the late Lord Keeper; Katherine, by Sir Henry Killigrew; Elizabeth, by Sir Thomas Hoby, and next by John Lord Russell; Margaret, the youngest of the five, by Sir Ralph Rowlet. Thus, Francis Bacon claimed, through his mother, close cousinry with Sir Robert Cecil, with Elizabeth and Ann Russell, with the witty and licentious race of Killigrews, and with the future statesman and diplomatist, Sir Edward Hoby. Bacon, however, with all the advantages of his position, did not win speedy success. An education that confided him to Cambridge at thirteen, and carried him to Paris at sixteen years of age, placed him in Gray's-inn, a student of law, as early as the summer of 1590, a few months after his nineteenth year. From that date till he gained the custody of the seals, he never failed in attention to the study and practice of his vocation. If philosophy was his Rachel, law was his Leah. It was true that he found time to be conspicuous as a leader, and unrivalled as an orator in the House of Commons, and also to play a brilliant part in that galaxy of wit and splendour that surrounded the virgin queen. But he never at any time neglected his profession. And yet his advances to the highest preferment were slow. Nor is this to be accounted for by any carelessness for place on his part. On all fit occasions he sought office. On every occasion of his seeking office his claims were allowed to be worthy of attention. More than once preferment was within an ace of his grasp, the cup touched his lip, when suddenly the prize was snatched away, and the cup dashed down—by some malignant and unseen power, as distant spectators thought. In this respect Bacon was emphatically an unlucky man. Favoured by the queen, respected in Westminster Hall, supported by powerful friends, and possessed of every minor talent, as well as the fine proportions and subtle inspirations of genius, he was, in the race for social distinctions, repeatedly outstripped by plodding mediocrity or cunning folly. In the September of 1593, he had reasonable hopes of getting the vacant post of Attorney-General; but Coke stepped into it, leaving him to turn wishful eyes on the place of Solicitor-General, left void by Coke. For this appointment he had strong claims. "A bencher and reader of his inn, he enjoyed a good reputation in chambers and in the courts. The best judges at the bar approved his rise. Burghley and Cecil cautiously promoted his suit, and Egerton pressed it with a noble friendship on all who had power to help or harm. Yet in the end, Thomas Fleming got the post, a man only known to the world for having stood in Bacon's way, and to the profession for his singular and disastrous ruling in the case of Bates. Bacon owed this loss of place to Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex; out of which cruel disappointment to him springs the charge of ingratitude to a patron—treason to a friend." The light that Mr. Dixon has been enabled to throw on this memorable passage of Bacon's life deserves especial notice.

"The earl's want of tact and temper" (he says) "is more hurtful to his friends than his foes. He does Raleigh no great harm, he causes Bacon the most grievous loss. Give me this place of Solicitor—he drums and drums at the Queen's ear. She thinks her law officers should be chosen by herself, and for their good parts, not to please the fancy or make good the pledges of a carpet knight. She will not do a right thing for a bad reason, or in a wrong way. Her courts are crowded with able men. She is old enough to choose a servant for herself. As Essex grows hot, she cools; when he storms upon her and will not be denied, she turns from the spoiled boy, her nomination made. Bacon must wait. Fleming shall be her man."

"Lord Campbell says, as writers have said from the days of Bushel, that the Earl atoned to Bacon for his failure by a gift of Twickenham-park. It happens, however, that Twickenham-park was not, and never had been, the Earl's to give. That lovely seat, which blooms by the Thames, close under Richmond-bridge, fronting the old palace, and some of the elms of which stand, venerable and green, in the days of Victoria, had belonged to the Bacons for many years. In 1574, while Essex was a boy at Chartley, Twickenham-park, together with More Mead, and Ferry Mead, the adjoining lands, had been granted by the Queen to Edward Bacon on lease. The lease is enrolled, and a copy of it may be read in one of the appendices of this book. Francis lived in the house, as the letters prove, long before his patent of Solicitor passed the seal. . . . Unable to pay his debt by a public office, Essex feels that he ought to pay it in money, or money's worth. The lawyer has done his work, must be told his fee. But the Earl has no funds. His debts, his amours, his camp of servants, eat him up. He will pay in a patch of land. To this Bacon objects; not that he need scruple at taking wages; not that the mode of payment is unusual; not that the price is beyond his claim. Four years have been spent in the Earl's service. To pay in land is the fashion of a time when gold is scarce, and soil is cheap. Nor is the patch too large; at most it may be worth £1,200, or £1,500. After Bacon's improvements, and the rise of rents, he sells it to Reynold Nicholas for £1,800. It is less than the third of a year's income from the Solicitor-General's place."

Having lost his chance on this occasion, Bacon had to wait many years for advancement. Elizabeth, contrary to the assertions of Basil Montague, Macaulay, and Lord Campbell, gave him many substantial proofs of her affectionate care for his interest. Besides the reversion of the registry of the Star Chamber, a post worth £1,600 a-year, a grant of land in Zelwood Forest, and other queenly gifts, she made him one of her counsel learned in the law; presented him with a reversion of a lease of Twickenham-park, and avowedly consulted him on important points in the law business of the Crown. But when the Queen died in 1603, he was, notwithstanding her good will to him and her good deeds, still fighting in the foremost ranks of the bar, untitled and unplaced. It was not till 1607, not until he had overcome the opposition to him at court with which the new reign opened, and had proved to James and to Cecil that the government of the country could not be carried on without his assistance, that he gained the first clear step in the official ladder, and was made Solicitor-General, on the 25th of June, 1607, at the age of forty-six years and five months. In 1613, he mounted to the Attorney-General's place. In the March of 1617, he was entrusted with the custody of the seals; and in the January of 1618, the Lord Keeper attained the higher grade of Chancellor.

"In the July of the same year he becomes a peer. His slanderers sink beneath his feet. No severity seems to the Privy Council too great for those, however high in rank, who menace his person or dispute his justice. For a saucy word they send Lord Clifton to the Fleet; for a complaint against one of his verdicts they commit Lady Ann Blount to the Marshalsea. In 1620, he publishes his "Novum Organum"—a book which has in it the germs of more power and good to man than any other work not of divine authorship in the world. He is now at the height of earthly fame. First layman in his own country; first philosopher in Europe—what is wanting to his felicity? Neither power, nor popularity, nor titles, nor love, nor fame, nor obedience, nor troops of friends. All these he has—no man in greater fulness. If his heart has other longings, he has only to express his wish. In January, 1621, he receives the title of Viscount St. Albans, in a form of peculiar honour—other peers being created by letters patent, he by investiture with the coronet and robe.

"Yet only seven months after printing the 'Greatest Birth of Time'—only three months after receiving in the King's presence the robe and coronet—he is stripped of his honours, degraded from his place, condemned to a monstrous fine, and flung into the Tower.

"The tale of this fall is the most strange and sad in the whole history of man."

No common praise is due to Mr. Dixon for the learning and logical precision with which he describes the internal construction of the great machine that so suddenly brought down the Chancellor from his place, and measures out to each person concerned in the drama—puppet or string-puller—his proper amount of pity or condemnation. We cannot do better than give, in the author's own words, the leading passages of the story.

"In striding over Coke's head to the mace and seals, Bacon puts the crown to his many offences against that wealthy and vindictive foe. Their lives have been spent in a daily contest for rank, love, place, and power. Up to the present year, Coke has been able to keep in front. He made more money; he won Lady Hatton; he first got office under the Crown. He went up to the Common Pleas, while Bacon was fighting for his promotion at the bar. Before the great philosopher was commissioned as Attorney-General, the great jurist had been seated on the King's Bench. For the three years and four months that Bacon, as Attorney, waited in the council ante-room, Coke sat at the board. The scene is now changed, the characters reversed. Within a few weeks, Coke has been degraded from the council to make way for Bacon, and reduced from the King's Bench that his rival may feel the insolent joy of refusing to accept his place. The humiliation has now been capped by Bacon filching from him, at the very moment of his negotiation with Villiers, the mace and seals, without paying for them one shilling of those irregular sums which he himself was told he must lay down. Such a success enrages the miser even more than it galls the man."

"How can he drag this rival down? The way is but too easy. Gain the favourite. Virtue is no protection to men in power. He has been thrown. Egerton only escaped an ignominious fall by the approach of death. The story of Egerton's latter days has never yet been told. As an illustration of the time, it is in the highest degree important for a clear comprehension of his successor's fall.

"As Egerton grew old, a host of lawyers and ecclesiastics began to crave the seals; conspicuous among these were Bilson and Bennet, Hobart and Coke. . . . As Egerton would not die, though he had held the seals longer than any Chancellor since the Conquest, nor yield his place except on reasonable terms of surrender, those who meant to make a purse by the transfer began to brood over the possibility of forcing him to yield by means of a criminal prosecution. A sentence in the House of Lords would be legal death. Once it were pronounced the seals would fall into the king's gift. This was a new and perilous game to play; but the plan seemed easy, the profits vast. A trial might be made. Any old lawyer, learned in the vices of the times, could get up an accusation. Buckingham could secure a majority in the House of Lords. The temptations which drew Buckingham into this odious and criminal course were very great. Sir John Bennet offered for the seals no less a sum than thirty thousand pounds."

All was ripe for a criminal prosecution of the aged chancellor. If the intelligence of the conspiracy against him was the final blow that laid him in his coffin, still the grave protected him from Villiers and his associated thieves. Death, however, did not play the desired part for them. The chancellorship was left vacant, but not for them to put up to auction. Without paying a single coin of blackmail to the marauders of St. James's, Bacon obtained the seals, and bade fair to keep them. Muddled with disappointment the gang saw that their only hope of plunder lay in reviving against Bacon the conspiracy they had nursed against Egerton. In the malevolence of Coke, and the chicanery of John Churchill, a perjured rascal who has altogether escaped the notice of historians previous to Mr. Dixon, the gang had instruments in every way fitted for their use. All that was required to be done was, for an outside rabble to declare that Bacon's lawful fees were bribes accepted for the corruption of justice, and for Buckingham's creatures in the House of Peers gravely to assent to the astounding proposition. Nor will any one acquainted with the critical position of judges at the time of Bacon's fall be surprised at the success of the plot. Mr. Dixon observes:—"To see why the threat of prosecution so deeply disturbed Egerton, and how easy it may be for unscrupulous men to frame a charge of corruption against his successor, a reader who is not a lawyer should remind himself of the state of society in the days of James the First.

"There is no civil list. Few men in the court or in the church receive salaries from the Crown; and each has to keep his estate and make his fortune out of fees and gifts. The King takes fees. The archbishop, the bishop, the rural dean take fees. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Baron of the Exchequer, the Master of the Rolls, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, the King's Serjeant, the Utter Barrister, all the functionaries of law and justice, take fees. The Lord Admiral takes fees. The Secretary of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Master of the Wards, the Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Gentlemen of the Bedchamber, all take fees. Everybody takes fees, everybody pays fees.

"In some public offices and courts the amount to be paid is fixed, either by ancient usage or by such a common understanding as in modern times controls a railway or steamboat fare. In some, particularly in the courts of justice, it is open. Bassanio may present his ducats; three thousand in a bag. The judge may only take a ring. A fee is due whenever an act is done. The occasions on which, by ancient usage of the realm, the king claims help or fine, are many; the sealing of an office or a grant; the knighting of his son; the marriage of his daughter; the alienation of lands in capite; his birthday, new year's day; the anniversary of his accession or his coronation; indeed at all times when he wants money and finds men rich enough and loyal enough to pay. In like manner the clergy levy tithe and toll; fees on christenings, fees on churchings, fees on marriages, fees on interments, Easter offerings, free offerings, charities, church reparations, church extensions, pews, and rents.

"In the Government offices it is the same as in the palace and the church. If the Attorney-General, the Secretary of State, the Lord Admiral, or the Privy Seal puts his signature on a sheet of paper, he takes his fee. Often it is his means of life—to wit, the retaining fee paid by the king to Cecil, as Premier Secretary of State, is a hundred pounds a year. But the fees from other sources are enormous. These fees are not bribes.

"The same at the bar and on the bench. The bar is a free profession: a member of the Temple or of Lincoln's-inn being bound to plead, as the knights, whose swords are rust, were bound to fight, in love and faith, taking no pay nor scrip. It is an order of courtesy and chivalry; its members the soldiers of justice, pledged to protect the weak, to help the needy, to defend the right. Now, all this service is by law and usage free. A barrister may not ask wages for his toil, like an attorney or a clerk, nor can he reclaim by any process of law, as the clerk and attorney can, the value of his time and speech. If he lives on the gifts of grateful clients, these gifts must be perfectly free. This theory of counsel's hire, though old as our language and our institutions, is, of course, a sham. No junior on the Oxford circuit dreams of succouring damsels from love of Dulcinea, or freeing galley-slaves from the obligations of knighthood. No guineas, no speech. The shifts by which lax attorneys are tickled into paying the fees which no law compels them to pay are droll as anything in the immortal laws of Barataria.

"Now, the rules which continue under Victoria to govern the bar, under James I. governed the bench. The Lord Chief Justice, or the Lord Chancellor, like the Secretary of State, is paid by fees. The king's judge is neither in deed nor in name a public servant; he receives a nominal sum as standing counsel for the Crown, and for the rest he depends on the income arising from his hearing of private causes. These facts appear in a comparison of the amounts paid by the Crown to its great legal functionaries, with the estimated profits of each particular post. Thus, the seals, though the Lord Chancellor had no proper salary, were in Egerton's time worth from ten to fifteen thousand pounds a-year. Bacon valued his place as Attorney-General at six thousand a-year; of which princely sum (twenty-five thousand a-year in coin of Victoria) the King only paid him eighty-one pounds six shillings and eightpence. Yelverton's place of Solicitor brought him three or four thousand a-year, of which he got seventy pounds from James. The judges had enough to buy their gloves and robes, not more. Coke, when Lord Chief Justice of England, drew from the State twelve farthings less than two hundred and twenty-five pounds a-year. When travelling circuit, he was allowed thirty-three pounds six shillings and eightpence for his expenses. Hobart, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, had twelve farthings less than one hundred and ninety-five pounds a-year; Tanfield, Lord Chief Baron of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, one hundred and eighty-eight pounds six shillings a-year. Yet each of these great lawyers had given up a lucrative practice at the bar. After their promotion to the bench, they lived in good houses, kept a princely state, gave dinners and masques, made presents to the King, accumulated goods and lands. Their wages were paid in fees by those who resorted for justice to their courts.

"These fees were not bribes. If the satirists, from Latimer to Nash, described the bench of bishops and the bench of judges as taking bribes, it was only in the vein common to lampooners in every age of the world; the vein in which Boccaccio describes his friars, and Jonson his Justice Oberdos. Serious men made no complaint. Judicial corruption was not a grievance in 1604. In 1606 an attempt to reduce the fees in one department of chancery business was rejected by the popular party in the House of Commons.

"In the great list of grievances, drawn up in 1604, we find complaints that Cecil lives in adultery, that Parliament is packed with courtiers, that the forest laws have been revived, that pardons are sold to cut-throats and felons, that monopolies are granted to duns, and patents bestowed on extortioners and pimps; not that the great lawyers are thought corrupt or that justice is supposed to be bought and sold.

"Nor is such a grievance felt though undescribed. In the list of grievances there is one charge against the Lord Chancellor Egerton. Had there been a second, it would certainly have been named. In 1604, the charge which law reformers made against Egerton, was that he held the two offices of Master of the Rolls and Keeper of the Great Seals. It never occurred to these men to complain that he took his wages in the shape of fees.

"The evidence produced against him, as Heneage Finch has told the House of Commons, proves his case and frees him from blame; of the twenty-two charges of corruption, three are debts—Compton's, Peacock's, and Vanlore's; two of these, Compton's and Vanlore's, debts on bond and interest. Any man who borrows money may be as justly charged with taking bribes. One case, that of the London companies, is an arbitration, not a suit in law. Even Cranfield, though bred in the city, cannot call their fee a bribe. Smithwick's gift, being found irregular, has been sent back. Thirteen cases—those of Young, Wroth, Hody, Barker, Monk, Trevor, Scott, Fisher, Lenthal, Dunch, Montagu, Ruswell, and the Frenchmen—are of daily practice in every court of law. They fall under Bacon's third list common fees, paid in the usual way, paid after judgment has been given. Kennedy's present of a cabinet for York House has never been accepted, the Chancellor hearing that the artisan who made it has not been paid. Reynell, an old neighbour and friend, gave him two hundred pounds towards furnishing York House, and sent him a ring on new year's day. Everybody gives rings, everybody takes rings, on a new year's day. The gift of five hundred pounds from Sir Ralph Hornsby was made after a judgment, though, as afterwards appeared, while a second, much inferior case, was still in hearing. The gift was openly made, not to the Chancellor, but to the officer of his court. The last case is that of Lady Wharton, the only one that presents an unusual feature. Lady Wharton, it seems, brought her presents to the Chancellor herself; yet even her gifts were openly made, in the presence of the proper officer and his clerk. Churchill admits being present in the room when Lady Wharton left her purse; Gardner, Keeling's clerk, asserts that he was present when she brought the two hundred pounds. Even Coke is staggered by proofs which prove so much, for who in his senses can suppose that the Lord Chancellor would have done an Act known to be illegal and immoral in the company of a registrar and a clerk? It is clear that a thing which Bacon did under the eyes of Gardner and Churchill must have been in his mind customary and right. It is no less clear that if Bacon had done wrong, knowing it to be wrong, he would never have braved exposure of his fraud by turning Churchill into the streets.

"Thus after the most rigorous and vindictive scrutiny into his official acts, and into the official acts of his servants, not a single fee or remembrance traced to the Chancellor can, by any fair construction, be called a bribe. Not one appears to have been given on a promise; not one appears to have been given in secret; not one is alleged to have corrupted justice."

But the character of the evidence was altogether an immaterial affair with the promoters of the prosecution. Hard pressed by malignant opponents who had already divided the spoils of victory, hopeless of meeting with justice by the notoriety of a public investigation, and doubtless influenced by the King's advice, Bacon made a qualified submission to angry foes and adverse circumstances. A confession of venal practice was never wrung from him. He would not even admit himself chargeable with corrupt intention. But responding one by one to the absurd accusations in terms that were nothing else but an incontrovertible argument for his innocence, he allowed that abuses had crept into the court over which he presided, and conceded that some of those abuses might be attributed to want of vigilance and method on his part. With this admission—not of guilt, but of defeat in a battle of the ante-chambers, he made a courtly bow to his unscrupulous antagonists, and requested that since they had gained their point they would, in decent regard of all chivalric sentiment, cease to molest him. What response this appeal to generosity met, is matter of history.

Societies and Institutions.

NEWCASTLE AND GATESHEAD LAW SOCIETY.

The committee of the Newcastle and Gateshead Law Society, at the 34th annual general meeting of the Society held on the 12th instant, presented the following report of their proceedings:—

As early as the month of February the attention of your committee was called by the Incorporated Law Society to the two Bills to amend the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843. The one was brought into the House of Lords by the Incorporated Law Society; the other into the House of Commons by Mr. John Locke.

The latter was a measure of a limited character and contained some objectionable clauses. The former was a renewal, (with additions,) of the Bill introduced last year by the Incorporated Law Society who had framed the original Bill of 1843 and treated the subject in a comprehensive manner.

A petition from this society in favour of the measure of the Incorporated Law Society was sent for presentation to the House of Lords on the 5th March.

Many communications passed between the Incorporated Law Society and your committee during the progress of this Bill and also with the Leeds Law Society and between your president Mr. Clayton, and Mr. Keith Barnes, solicitor, of London.

In the month of April, letters were addressed to six of the local members of Parliament asking their support to the Bill of the Incorporated Law Society, which was passed at the latter end of August with a modification of some of the matter considered objectionable in Mr. Locke's Bill.

The other principal Bills affecting the profession were the Bankruptcy Consolidation Bill introduced by the Attorney General, that of Lord St. Leonard's "to further amend the Law of Property" and Lord Cranworth's "to give to trustees and others certain powers now commonly inserted in settlements, mortgages and wills;" also a Bill introduced by Lord Brougham "touching the transfer of real estate and the registration of the titles thereof."

These several legislative measures more or less had the attention of your committee. The Bill of Lord Brougham made no way in the House of Lords, and was soon abandoned; as to the Bankruptcy Bill, your committee was favoured with "remarks" by Mr. Ford, of the firm of Rogerson & Ford, and with "notes" and "further notes" by Mr. Lawrance, of the firm of Lawrance & Plews. After occupying attention for some time the Bill was withdrawn by Sir R. Bethell, but it is understood will be reintroduced during the ensuing Session.

Your committee will take the earliest opportunity of obtaining a print of the Bill as brought before the house when Parliament opens and proposes to call a general meeting of the Society with reference to a measure of such great importance.

The other two Bills of Lord St. Leonard's and Lord Cranworth's passed through both houses and became law.

During the progress of the above mentioned Bills your Committee received many important suggestions from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association as well as from the Incorporated Law Society.

Your committee have much pleasure in referring to the aggregate meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association which was holden in Newcastle on the 9th and 10th October last.

The preparations for this meeting received the careful attention of your committee, who have much pleasure in recording the cordial co-operation this society received from the members of the profession at large in the town and neighbourhood in giving the Association which did Newcastle the honour of making it their place of meeting a cordial and friendly reception.

Your committee feel a pleasure in recording the meeting not merely as a passing event of the present year, but as being amongst the most valuable and important of the annals of the profession.

Your committee during the events of the year have to lament the death of Mr. James Arnott, and more recently that of Mr. Matthew Forster, who was long a member of this society and had been for many years the father of the profession of Newcastle.

Your committee have been much impressed with the importance of various observations made at the late meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association suggestive of the greater unity and approximation of the profession as a general incorporation under an extension of the charter of the Incorporated Law Society, and would take the liberty of suggesting the appointment of a special committee of this society to give this question a careful and deliberate consideration.

Your committee beg to report that the society at present numbers 79 members.

Law Amendment Society.

SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENTS IN OUR SYSTEM OF LEGISLATION BY PRIVATE BILLS.

The following paper was read by Mr. PULLING, at a meeting of this society on the 3rd instant.

The phrase—system of legislation—in reference to private Bills has, at this day, a received meaning, though it is not altogether appropriate.

The practice of exceptional interference with the general course of the law, by private and special enactments, concessions, and dispensations, rather implies a series of anomalies than legislation, and certainly represents no system of legislation.

To interfere with the course of the general law, in favour or to the prejudice of individuals, is neither legislation nor judicial administration; it is hardly more or less than the arbitrary dispensation of absolute power.

Under purely despotic governments, whatever receives the sanction of the sovereign becomes legal; and in our own country, under the sway of the Plantagenets, the impress of the great seal or the sanction of the sign manual warped the law to the occasion of every favoured applicant. Letters from the Crown, abundantly to be found on the Patent and Close Rolls, assumed to give a ready relief against legal obstructions in the way of private schemes.

Living now under a constitutional government, which admits of no royal grants, concessions, or dispensations, infringing on the general law of the land, we are made to feel that the general law can be adapted to the exigencies of any individuals who pursue the forms prescribed, and have the money required, for obtaining a private Act of Parliament.

Private Acts in the present age, if they do not, like the early documents under that title to be found on the Rolls of the compliant Parliaments of Edward IV. and Richard III., bastardize a troublesome competitor for the Crown, or partition the possessions of those out of power among the adherents and friends of the ruling body, still work the injustice that is inevitable wherever general laws are made to yield to individual importunities.

If it be the lot of one of us to be involved in a dispute with a company invested with parliamentary powers, we may soon be made to feel that, not the general law of England, but a special statute passed on the private petition of our adversary, is to adjust the differences between us. Even if carefully endeavouring to avoid direct negotiations and transactions with bodies thus armed, we have little chance of ignoring or disregarding the provisions of private Acts of Parliament. We cannot travel or stay at home without bringing ourselves within the operation of some of the special enactments. Every railway, canal, or turnpike-road; every harbour, dock, or pier; almost every town, or large parish, has its collection of local acts. If the street in front of our doors is obstructed; if the supply of water or gas to our houses be capriciously stopped; if the rate collector summarily calls on us for any unexpected contribution, we may rely on finding the imposition sanctioned, not by the general law, but by some extraordinary enactment of the Legislature, passed on a private petition.

The volumes of our Statute Law at this time contain no less than twenty-seven thousand local, personal, and private Acts of Parliament, varying the general public law, and containing enactments having almost every variety of object—compulsorily to dispossess the owners of private property, under the pretence of the public good—freely to give certain joint stock companies the management and control of our rivers, harbours, roads, and streets, and other property, essentially public—to confer monopolies and arbitrary powers, tolls and taxes, wholly unknown to the common law.

These special acts introduce an endless variety of conditions and terms into all contracts and transactions with the privileged bodies; penalties and penal proceedings—often of a very vexatious character—innovating on the first principles of the common law, the law of evidence, the rights of property and of civil liberty—mere private trespasses on the privileged property visited with serious punishments—in some instances the offences magnified into felonies.

Opposed as such anomalous enactments are to every principle of justice, hardly less objectionable is the way in which they pass the parliamentary ordeal. Framed wholly to meet the purposes of the promoters, a local and personal Bill comes before a select committee in either House, rarely opposed by any one but a rival applicant for similar privileges. The contest in committee is carried on between these rivals week after week, during the Parliamentary Session. Lawyers, engineers, and witnesses—on some occasions there have been as many as four hundred concerned in one Bill (all of them extravagantly paid for their services)—come only to promote the special interests of those for whom they severally appear. No one, professionally or otherwise, is engaged to watch or advocate the interests of the public: and the wearied members of committee, overwhelmed with a thousand sophistries and misrepresentations, are too glad to see the prospect of terminating the contests which actually arise, without volunteering inquiries affecting merely the public interests. Select committees have been over and over again denounced as the very worst tribunals that could be devised for the investigation of the merits of a private bill project. The prodigal costliness of the proceedings before these committees, often amounting, in the case of our railway companies, to a very large proportion of all their capital—and, in the case of many local improvement bills, to enormous sums, directed to be raised afterwards by tolls and impositions on the public—have made one evil of private bill legislation press where it is sure to make itself felt.

Shareholders who contributed funds thus misapplied and perverted from their legitimate purpose—the public who have been taxed in various ways to meet the deficiency, all feel that Select Committee expenses are a gross abuse. When we find the expenditure of the Great Northern Railway in parliamentary costs amounting to half a million sterling before the undertaking itself was even commenced—when we find (as parliamentary reports show us) companies consuming their entire property and proposed capital in obtaining, or endeavouring to obtain, the concession of parliamentary powers—the practice which sanctions and necessitates such breaches of trust, might be justly stigmatized as something more than a mere abuse.

Last, though not the least, of the evils of private Bill proceedings, is the obstruction they offer to the legitimate business of Parliament. In the great railway session of 1846, there were no less than five hundred sittings of select committees, as many as thirty-four being held in one day. When session after session, amidst the loud complaints of wearied members and of disappointed constituents, private bill committees consume that time which, judiciously applied to the details of public business, might prevent the repetition of the annual outcry about reforms postponed, inquiries refused, the estimates scrambled through, and great public questions neglected—we may justly denounce the private bill system as directly obstructing the business of the nation. Were the labours of private bill committees to be lessened, and the valuable time thus consumed to be devoted to committees to be appointed for the thorough investigation of the details, and expediting the progress of public questions before Parliament, the annual disappointment referred to would indeed be lessened.

The unjustifiable costliness, the anomalous character, the inconvenient and irksome proceedings of private bill committees, obstructive as they are to public business, and so wholly unsatisfactory in their results, have been the subject of vehement condemnation by all classes, for a great many years—by parliamentary committees without number—by judges who have vainly endeavoured to construe and practically apply the exceptional enactments—and by the public, who have to suffer and pay for it all.

The anomalous authority exercised by Parliament in the case of private bills has ever been deemed to require the utmost vigilance. The preliminary investigation by the ancient officers called Receivers and Triers of Petitions and the subsequent examination by the Judges summoned in the House of Lords having gone into disuse, standing orders have been made in modern times, with the view to realise the eulogistic apology of Blackstone (vol. iii, p. 345), that “private Acts of Parliament are carried on in both Houses with great deliberation and caution, and that nothing is done without the consent of all parties in being and capable of consent, that have the remotest interest in the matter.”

As the practice of parliamentary interference by private bills has gradually extended from mere cases of disentailing private estates with the consent of every individual concerned, to extensive joint stock undertakings of a distinctly public character, at the prayer only of the schemers, it has, after years of experimental change, been found that no standing orders are sufficient to prevent imposition and injustice. The inherent defects of a system by which the distinct functions of the legislator and judge are sought to be united, defy all human efforts to cure it.

In 1846 the abuses practised before private bill committees excited so much attention, that Parliament was induced to pass an Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 106, affirming the self-evident proposition, that “it is expedient that facilities should be given for procuring more complete and trustworthy information previous to inquiries before either House of Parliament on applications in certain cases for private Acts.” But the complete and trustworthy information which was directed by that Act, and the amending Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 129), was practically limited to certain matters affecting the special interests confided to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the Admiralty, and these preliminary inquiries were not required to be made in such a manner as to afford Parliament or the public any light on the real merits of a proposed scheme: which might, for anything that appeared in such preliminary investigation, be most prejudicial to private rights, without producing any commensurate public advantages. These preliminary inquiries, as might be expected, were therefore after a short time pronounced a failure, and the statutes prescribing them repealed (by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 129).

With some alterations in detail in the routine of select committees, the regulations affecting private bills remain almost as they were. The chief objections to them continue, and with, perhaps, the exception of parliamentary agents and practitioners, every class affected by private bills and private Acts of Parliament unite in denouncing them as a monstrous inconvenience and a monstrous abuse.

The instituting a preliminary investigation of the facts, which is a principle of our whole system of justice, which the common law requires before judgment can be pronounced, which is followed in every tribunal in this country, either in the shape of a trial by jury or reference to some subordinate officer, or to some competent person specially appointed to reduce the facts into the shape of a special case, is practically ignored by Parliament, who proceed to the second stage of a private bill, without any investigation of the merits, and then, in the objectionable manner already spoken of, delegate the investigation and the real power of ultimate decision to a few members of their own body.

Anticipating, from a notice of motion already given for next session, that Parliament will, before long, again take into consideration the whole question of private bill procedure, it may be worthy the attention of this Society whether the following suggestions might not, with some advantage, be submitted to the attention of the Legislature:—

1. Let competent persons be appointed by both Houses of Parliament, invested with the full powers of the ancient triers and receivers of petitions, and the modern examiners; and let every petition for a private bill be referred to one of such persons, who, having summoned before him, and fully heard all parties interested, and fully examined all material evidence, parol or documentary, should make a full and complete report to Parliament not only of the compliance with the standing orders, but of the objects and proved facts relating to each petition, and the evidence, conflicting or otherwise, by which it is promoted or opposed, and the precise way in which the proposed Bill deviates, in any clause, from the general law of the land.

2. Let no petition for a private bill be presented to either House without such report, accompanied with copies of all maps, plans, and documents referred to therein.

3. Let the attention of Parliament, in committee or otherwise, be confined to the disposal of the questions arising on the report, and any exceptions to such report duly presented by any party having a recognised locus standi; and let the facts shown on such report, or any report on any fresh investigation, directed in consequence of such exceptions, be conclusive.

4. Let general regulations be made for petitions for such private bills being presented at any period of the year, and being referred at once to the appointed examiner by the Lord Chancellor or Speaker—for the purpose of such examination, altogether or in part, in the immediate locality to be affected by the proposed bill—and for visiting with exemplary costs all persons guilty of vexatious proceedings.

5. Let all common form clauses, of every class of local and personal Act, be consolidated into one or more general Acts, and made to operate in all cases of a similar character, both as regards existing and future local and personal Acts, whether such clauses regulate the mode of procedure, the form of conveyance, &c.; and

6. Let Parliament, as speedily as possible, pursue the course taken with respect to local courts, the enclosure of waste lands, watching, lighting, police, and various other matters formerly regulated by special Acts, and substitute general and systematic legislation for that which is now merely anomalous and pernicious.

These amendments in the mode of proceeding with respect to applications for private Acts of Parliament, would not only materially diminish the present expenditure of public and private time and money before committees, and secure to Parliament complete and trustworthy information respecting each application, but the reform could, unlike any change hitherto suggested, be effected without in any way intrenching on the legitimate function or privileges of either House of Parliament.

In lieu of the loose and unsatisfactory investigation under the present mode of proceeding, an authentic record of the facts of every case would come before Parliament, enabling each branch of the Legislature to decide on those proved facts, and apply the redress which the constitution has empowered Parliament to afford.

Lord Stanley, M.P., Mr. Cranford, M.P., and Mr. Ewart, M.P., were present, and took part in the discussion.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Mr. Hallard, one of the sheriffs' substitutes of Midlothian, has recently published an interesting pamphlet containing a proposal to facilitate the abolition of feudal conveyancing. It consists for the most part of a paper which he read in September, at the Glasgow Conference. In Scotland, as our readers are aware, a tenure by which land is held under a perpetual feu-duty or rent is common; and the essential question raised by Mr. Sheriff Hallard is, whether it would not be generally beneficial that the superior lord should always be compellable to dispose upon certain prescribed conditions of the feu-duty payable to him? "Assuming," he says, "that feu-duties and casualties are capable of valuation at a certain sum as their just and lawful price, I propose to enable proprietors to obtain immunity from these burdens on payment of that price." In the discussion which followed the reading of Mr. Hallard's paper, Lord Neaves and Lord Curriehill took the opposite side, and insisted that there was no reason why burdens on land should not be perpetual if the parties chose to make them so; to which it was rejoined by Mr. Hallard, that neither was there any reason why burdens on land, in form perpetual, should not be made redeemable by the debtor on equitable terms for his creditor, if a public good is to be attained thereby. By the phrase "equitable terms," Mr. Hallard means to guard against the obvious embarrassment which would arise from the possibility of the disturbance of existing settlements. The remedy he proposes is, that the annual payment might be declared irredeemable for a certain term of years, and that a due "interval of premonition" might always be fixed by law or left to private stipulation.

The subject discussed by Mr. Hallard is one of great interest in Scotland where the feu-tenure is common, and also in Ireland, where the fee-farm tenure, which is of a similar nature, is not unfrequent. The same principle, however, would have some application in England, and its discussion will not be without interest, not only to lawyers, but to all persons conversant with social and political economy.

The following advertisement appeared in the Manchester Guardian, of the 2nd instant:—

DIVORCE ACT.—Persons wanting a DIVORCE or PROTECTION, should apply to KNOWLES & ISAACS, law agents, 37, Brown-street, Manchester.

We have not been able to find in the Law List the names of either of the above-mentioned practitioners, and presume, therefore, that they are poachers on our grounds. Divorce and protection business, however, requires the intervention of some regularly admitted solicitor, and we are curious to know who is the gentleman that lends his name as a stalking horse to Messrs. Knowles & Isaacs, or for whom they act as jackals. Do they keep a lawyer as Moses & Sons do a poet, or does a lawyer use them to hunt up business for him?

The Globe of yesterday evening has an amusing letter on the tonsorial etiquette of the bar. The writer mentions the case of a barrister "whose practice had latterly, it is believed, been principally in the East," who recently appeared at an assizes, wearing a moustache and beard, which called down upon him some comments from the bench not unlike those which Dr. Wigram lately hurled at the Rochester clergy. Since the present military fashion came into vogue the question has often been mooted whether it is allowable for barristers to appear in court with all the hirsute honours of manhood. Sir George Bowyer, who wears a very manly beard, has appeared in it, not only in courts of law but we believe also at Lincoln's-inn. Mr. Crauford, M.P., has more than once appeared professionally in his ample moustache and beard, in appeal cases in the House of Lords; and we think it is very doubtful whether there is any judge on the bench on either side of Westminster Hall to whom a barrister would be invisible because he was unshaven. The correspondent of the Globe, however, is very witty upon the subject, and we have no doubt, if any judge likes to emulate the fame of the Bishop of Rochester, that he need have no difficulty in accomplishing his wishes by reading the bar such a lecture as Dr. Wigram has given to his clergy.

On New Year's day the Act to Amend the Law relating to the Election Duties and Payment of County Coroners (23 & 24 Vict. c. 116), came into operation. It is enacted by section 3, that from and after the 31st of December, 1860, so much of any Act as provides for the remuneration of county coroners by fees, mileage, and allowances, shall be repealed; and by section 4, that in lieu of fees, mileage, and allowances, each county coroner shall be paid such an annual salary as shall be agreed upon between him and the justices in general quarter sessions assembled, such salary not being less than the annual amount of the fees, mileage, and allowances actually received by such coroner, or his predecessor, for the five years immediately preceding the 31st of December, 1859; and by the same section it is provided that in case any such justices, and any such county coroner, shall be unable to agree as to the amount of the salary to be paid, the Secretary of State for the Home Department may determine the amount of such salary.

At most of the county sessions the subject has already been under the consideration of the magistrates, and the salaries of the coroners have been fixed, but all those gentlemen do not appear to be satisfied with the amount which has been allotted to them, and in some instances have expressed their intention to appeal to the Secretary of State, under the power reserved to them by the Act.

LIABILITIES OF SHIPOWNERS.

The case of Cope v. Doherty (6 W. R. 537, on app. 695), to which we referred in a previous number (ante, p. 85), expressly decides that the 504th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which limits the liability of shipowners to the value of the vessel and the freight, does not apply to foreign ships. In that case both vessels were American, and the collision, which was the subject of inquiry, took place within British jurisdiction, that is to say, off the coast of Ireland. The importance of the decision was at once recognised by the mercantile community, both in this country and in America. Had both vessels been British, the liability of that in fault would not have exceeded £10,000. As it was, the liability was declared to be limited only by the amount of damage done, and this appeared to be upwards of £33,000. In the case of collisions between British and foreign vessels, the decision in Cope v. Doherty will involve inconsistencies of a still more glaring kind. If, for example, the British ship is in fault, the liability of its owners will be limited in the manner already described; whereas, if the foreign ship is in fault, the measure of liability will be the amount of damage done. The nationality of the vessel having been once ascertained, it will be the duty of the Court simply to apply the rule of limited or unlimited liability as the case may be. That this state of the law is both unsatisfactory and unjust is sufficiently apparent. It creates a distinction between the British and foreign shipowners so manifestly to the disadvantage of the latter, that we need not be surprised that the decision in Cope v. Doherty has been regarded with much uneasiness in the United States, and that it has, as we are informed, been the subject of frequent discussion in the Chamber of Commerce in New York, with the view of effecting some international arrangement whereby the present defective state of the law may be remedied. The Chamber of Commerce at Liverpool had previously taken the matter up, and their recommendation upon the subject is a very simple one. They are of opinion that the limitation of liability secured to the British shipowner by the 504th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, should be extended forthwith to foreign ships. And they are further of opinion that this boon should be conceded at once, and without any attempt to negotiate with foreign governments upon the subject. They express these opinions, as they stated in their report, which was published some eighteen months ago, in the full confidence that foreign nations would soon follow our liberal example.

The Committee of the House of Commons, which was appointed last session to inquire into the condition of our merchant shipping, appears to have arrived at a different conclusion. It did not fail to perceive that the application of the rule in Cope v. Doherty, if followed up in foreign countries, might involve the British shipowner in ruinous liabilities. The municipal law of the United States with reference to the subject seems to be identical with our own. On the 3rd of March, 1851, that is three years previous to the passing of our Merchant Shipping Act, a statute was passed which provides that "the liability of the owner or owners of any ship or vessel for any embezzlement, loss, or destruction by the masters, officers, mariners, passengers, or any other person or persons, of any property, goods, or merchandise shipped or put on board of such ship or vessel, or for any loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture, done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of such owner or owners, shall in no case exceed the amount or value of the interest of such owner or owners respectively in such ship or vessel and her freight then pending." So far as we are aware, it has not yet been decided by the tribunals of the United States, whether or not this statute is restricted in its application to American shipping; but after the decision in Cope v. Doherty there can be little doubt, whenever the question may arise, as to the result. The law of France and of Holland, though differing somewhat in its details, is substantially the same with that of England and America with respect to the liability of shipowners, and questions may any day arise between any two of these countries such as have arisen in the above-named case. We can easily imagine the case of a new and valuable ship, with a valuable cargo on board, being run down by an old and worthless vessel, and the owners of the latter being held responsible for the whole amount of damage done. But in order to provide against such contingencies, the Committee of the House of Commons does not recommend us to follow the liberal advice of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce—namely, to extend at once to the foreign shipowner the protection enjoyed by our own. The Committee of the House of Commons has apparently less faith in the liberality of foreign countries than the merchants of Liverpool; for it recommends that the matter should be settled upon principles of international reciprocity. It suggests the adoption of some uniform rule upon the subject among maritime nations; and until this rule is adopted, it seems to think that our own law, as it now stands, should be maintained.

We are inclined to think that this, upon the whole, would be the wiser course. The principle of reciprocity as applied to commerce may be repudiated by the political economist, but it always has been the basis of international law. The only question is, whether the object which we have in view would not be sooner attained by adopting the advice of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce? But there seems to be no good reason why we should go out of our way to relieve the foreign shipowner from responsibility without some kind of guarantee that the same advantages will be extended to our own. Our recent experience of the liberality of foreign countries and foreign codes is not such as to induce us to leave the matter entirely at their discretion; and it is only by an international agreement between the principal maritime countries of the world that this matter can be settled on a satisfactory basis. We believe that Mr. W. S. Lindsay, during his recent visit to the United States, found a strong disposition on the part both of the mercantile community and of the Government, to come to some understanding on the subject. It is but natural that the two first commercial countries in the world should take the initiative in a matter equally interesting to both, and likely to increase in interest every day, on account of the rapid progress of commerce and shipping. We trust, therefore, that Mr. Lindsay's efforts may be eventually attended with success.

There are one or two other points upon which, in the opinion of the Committee on Merchant Shipping, a change in the law is desirable. Their report states that since the passing of the Act of 1854, what are called "Protecting Societies" have been formed at several of the outports, upon principles of mutual insurance, in which it is customary to insure vessels at far beyond their real value, in order to cover the liabilities to which the owners might be subjected in the case of passengers on board being lost or injured. Much conflicting evidence was given before the Committee respecting the legality of these insurances, the prevailing opinion being, in the absence of any express decision upon the subject, that they would not be sustained by a court of law. The Committee, therefore, recommend that the doubts which now exist upon the subject should be settled by statute, "declaring with reference to the liabilities recited in the 503rd and 504th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, that no policy of insurance shall be deemed to be invalid by reason of the nature of this risk." To the adoption of this suggestion we do not see any valid objection. As it is now the policy of the law to render the shipowner liable in case of loss of life incurred through negligence at sea, it is but fair that he should be allowed to protect himself against these additional risks. Passengers by railway are insured every day, and there seems to be no reason why there should be another rule with regard to passengers at sea.

With another recommendation of the committee we are not inclined to agree. The report states that at present "the law inflicts a heavier punishment upon the owner of the vessel best adapted to provide (from her superior construction) for the safety of passengers; and the responsibility of the owner actually increases with the increased means he employs to provide for the health, safety, and comfort of those who embark in his vessel." The committee is, therefore, of opinion, that an absolute sum of £15 per ton, whatever may be the actual value, should in all cases be fixed as the definite valuation of the ship, and that all consideration of freight should be excluded. Why the freight should be excluded they do not inform us; and we can see no reason why a rule long recognised by this as well as by other maritime countries should be thus capriciously set aside. It is for the interest of the shipowners of all countries, that the amount of their liabilities should be rendered as nearly as practicable the same; but were the recommendations of the committee adopted upon this point, a distinction would be established with regard to the British shipowner, which foreign countries in all probability would not be inclined to follow. We showed on a former occasion that our law is derived from them, not theirs from us.

Such are the chief points touched upon by the committee in that branch of their report which relates to the legal liabilities of shipowners. It is very easy to make laws so stringent as to defeat the objects of their authors; and we are told in one part of the report, that many wealthy British shipowners have refused to take passengers on board, on account of the great and uncertain risks attending such traffic; if this is really so the public are the true sufferers. If the better class of shipowners are now prevented from engaging in the passenger traffic, no better reason can be assigned for the amendment of the law.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS.

A question of considerable importance to both branches of the profession was mooted in the Leeds Town Council, on Tuesday last; and we think it well deserves the attention of our readers. Some fourteen years ago, the Council appointed two gentlemen, who are known as public prosecutors, to conduct all prosecutions arising within the Borough of Leeds, although it is very difficult to see whence the Council derived power to make such an appointment. Indeed it may be safely averred that the appointment would have been utterly nugatory, had not the borough magistrates combined with the council to render it effectual. This they did by binding over to prosecute, in every case, not the party aggrieved, but some police officer who it was understood should, as a matter of course, retain one or other of the gentlemen appointed by the council to conduct the prosecution at sessions or assizes. We have no doubt that this system has worked admirably for the interests of the two gentlemen referred to, and that they have every reason to congratulate themselves upon its adoption; but their professional brethren have certainly suffered from it, and it may reasonably be doubted whether the public have in any appreciable degree been benefited.

With regard to the injury inflicted upon the great body of the Leeds attorneys, there can be no question as to its existence, for they have been utterly shut out from the borough prosecutions, even although the parties aggrieved may have been their own clients, and they may have conducted the case before the magistrates up to the committal of the prisoner. At that stage the public prosecutor steps in and says virtually, "Now that you have got this case up for me I take it out of your hands; you have done all the drudgery, but I claim the substantial rewards." It really seems, however, unnecessary to enlarge upon this part of the subject, because, when it is an admitted fact that the two appointees of the council have all the borough prosecutions, no one can doubt that the other members of the profession practising in the town are damnified.

But are the public benefited by this arrangement? It must be observed that the public prosecutors do nothing in the way of detecting crime or of sifting the evidence before the magistrates. That is left altogether to the party aggrieved or his attorney or to the police, and it is only when the case is ripe for trial that the public prosecutors make their appearance on the stage. The public, therefore, derive no advantage from the services of the public prosecutors in the most important stages of the inquiry in criminal cases. These functionaries neither initiate the proceedings, nor exercise any discretion as to their initiation, and thus they do nothing either to prevent, in the first stage, a failure of justice, or trumpery cases from being committed for trial. Nor is anything saved in the costs of the prosecution, for the public prosecutors receive just the same fees as any other attorney would do, and the very fact that they know that they must be employed in every case has a tendency to make them less vigilant than if the prosecutions were open to the profession at large—unless indeed Leeds human nature is superior to the same article elsewhere.

Cases, moreover, might easily be put where the party aggrieved would feel it a monstrous hardship that the prosecution should be conducted by an entire stranger to himself, as for example in the case of forgeries on banks, embezzlements by merchant's clerks, and other important crimes, where the real prosecutor would deem it as important to have the advice and assistance of his own attorney, as on a purchase or mortgage. Such advice and assistance, however, he cannot have at Leeds unless he pay for it out of his own pocket, and unless the public prosecutor will allow the interference of another attorney. The official of the Town Council and the policeman, the nominal prosecutor, have the matter entirely in their own hands, and the unfortunate aggrieved has no control whatever over it.

With regard to the effect of this system upon the bar, it is at once ludicrous and painful. The public prosecutors, in order to avoid the appearance of partiality, deal out to every barrister who makes his appearance at the Leeds Borough Sessions one or two briefs, with an additional one to those connected with the town, and to those who are of long standing at the bar. This distribution of briefs is known as soup, and it obviously has a tendency to lower the tone of the bar, and to take away an important stimulus to exertion. Every man is sure of his soup, and had he the ability of an Erskine he would at Leeds get nothing more, at least in the shape of prosecutions. So notorious is it that every counsel coming to the sessions there will get his share of soup briefs that some half-dozen gentlemen who never make their appearance elsewhere in the West Riding find themselves regularly in the robing-room at the Leeds Town Hall, on the day of holding the borough sessions in that town.

It is, we think, high time that a system which is at once so unjust to the attorneys, so detrimental to the interests of the public, and so degrading to the bar, should be abolished.

INDIAN JUSTICE.

The case of Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt, reported in the last number of the Weekly Reporter, was one which few Englishmen can read without pain, or perhaps incredulity. Rogers, the appellant, was a captain in the merchant service, who had been appointed to the responsible office of Superintendent of Marine at Calcutta, part of the duties of which were to control and regulate the pilotage of the port. With a view of rendering this service more efficient, a body of pilots were organised under the special control of the superintendent, who were known as the Bengal Pilot Service; but free scope was given to other pilots, who did not belong to the service, to exercise their calling, and over these of course the superintendent had no authority. In September, 1857, when the Indian mutiny was at its worst, her Majesty's ship Belleisle, 74, Captain Rodd, arrived in the river with troops on board, and Captain Rodd, having obtained a pilot, applied to the captain of a steam tug, called the Underwriter, to tow the ship up to Calcutta. The captain of the tug demanded at first 3,000 rupees, and then 2,500 rupees, the latter sum being much more than the usual Government allowance; and Captain Rodd, not choosing to incur the responsibility of acceding to this demand, telegraphed to Mr. Beadon, the secretary to the Government, for instructions. Mr. Beadon thereupon sent for Captain Rogers, and asked his advice, which was that to accede to the demand at that moment of peril would be a bad precedent, and injurious to the public service; and he proposed that if the owners of the tug persisted in taking advantage of the necessities of the Government, he should prohibit the pilots under his command from employing that tug. To this proposal Mr. Beadon gave his sanction, and left the matter in the hands of Captain Rogers, who went immediately and carried out what he considered to be the instructions of the Government, and on the 22nd September issued a notice prohibiting the Bengal Pilot Service from employing the steam tug in question.

Up to this point it is difficult to see that any blame attaches either to Mr. Beadon or to Captain Rogers. The order may have been an arbitrary one, but the moment was critical, and the exigencies of the public service demanded vigorous action. The captain of the man-of-war had demanded instructions from the secretary to the Government, who consulted the chief officer of marine, and authorised him to adopt a certain course, the effect of which was undoubtedly beneficial to the public service. But the sequel of the story is of a less pleasing character. The owner of the tug wrote to the Government complaining of the order; and on the 24th of September—only two days after he had sanctioned the issuing of the order—Mr. Beadon actually subscribed his name to a letter stating that the order complained of did not emanate from the Government, and referring him to Captain Rogers for redress. And on the 15th of October, Mr. Beadon wrote an official despatch to Captain Rogers, in the name of the Governor-General in Council, severely censuring the conduct of Captain Rogers in issuing the order, and commanding its immediate withdrawal. This command was carried into effect on the 29th of October, and it is not surprising that after this public disavowal and reprimand of an officer in the position of Captain Rogers, the owners of the tug, being natives, conceived that his star was declining, and that they might make him pay for the damage which they had sustained. They accordingly commenced an action against him in the Supreme Court, and obtained a verdict, with damages to the amount of 6,624 rupees, calculated on the entire period during which the order was in force, all of which delay (be it remarked), except the first two days, was occasioned by the length of time which elapsed before Mr. Beadon thought fit to direct Captain Rogers to withdraw the order. This last circumstance appears to have been quite lost sight of by the judge who tried the case. Captain Rogers, as might have been expected, obtained a rule to set aside the verdict, or at least reduce the damages; but Sir James Colvile, and Sir Charles Jackson, the judges of the Supreme Court, in a long and learned judgment, in which the authorities on torts and injuries were discussed with great minuteness, but in which the merits of the case were scarcely alluded to, discharged the rule with costs.

The situation of Captain Rogers was then, indeed, a hopeless one. Disarmed, deserted, and disgraced by the Government whose instructions he had only too faithfully followed; denied ordinary justice by the highest court of the country; saddled with heavy costs and heavy damages, occasioned almost wholly by the delay of the Government in recalling their own order; his courage might well have failed him. There was but one resource left to him, and that a perilous one to a man in his position, but, with a perseverance which does him honour, he adopted it. He appealed to Cæsar. From the injustice of the provincial government and the provincial judicature, he appealed to the Queen in Council; and his persistency was rewarded. The facts of the case, sifted by the experienced and unbiassed minds of the Judicial Committee, assumed a different aspect, and the acts of the various parties appeared in their true light. The legal obscurity which had gathered round the case was dissipated, and after a patient hearing and due deliberation the judgment of the Calcutta judges was reversed with costs.

The frequency of instances in which the decisions of Indian judges are reversed on appeal, and the consequent uncertainty of the law in that country, must be a matter of grave anxiety to independent persons who may be tempted to embark their fortunes in India. But the absence of that official honour which leads nearly all governments and departments to support and indemnify their own officers, when acting bonâ fide according to the instructions of their superiors, is even more serious, as no government can ever be effectually served on such terms. Let us hope that the time may be come when free discussion and a higher tone of feeling in our Indian dependencies may render the recurrence of such scandal impossible.

THE AMERICAN SLAVE CASE.

The struggle between freedom and slavery in America has, in the eyes of our countrymen, become one great question of the union or disunion of the States. Minor points of the question are merged. Even when it has reached Canada, and a yellow man of Missouri, flying from bondage and slaying his pursuer in his flight, takes refuge on the British side of the St. Lawrence, and is adjudged by the Queen's Bench at Toronto to be given up to the gibbet or the stake under an extradition treaty as a murderer, our readers regard the proceeding merely as a local extension of the struggle. They speculate upon the features of it as politicians, or shudder at the issue as men, rather than feel concern as lawyers. Yet the treaty under which the Governor of Canada has been required to give up John Anderson to southern "justice," is no less applicable to the mother country through an Imperial Act than to her American colony by a statute of Canada. The Queen and the United States are the original contracting parties. In 1843 it was agreed between them that they should, upon mutual requisitions by them or their ministers, officers, or authorities, deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or other crimes mentioned, committed within the jurisdiction of either of the high contracting parties, should seek an asylum, or be found within the territories of the other. It was at the same time provided, that this should only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive should be found, would "justify his apprehension and commitment for trial," if the crime had been there committed; and that the judges or magistrates of the two governments should have power, upon complaint made under oath, to issue a warrant that he might be brought before the judge or magistrate, and the evidence be heard and considered; and if the evidence should be deemed "sufficient to sustain the charge," it should be the duty of the judge or magistrate to certify to the executive authority, that a warrant might issue for the surrender of the fugitive. In the present case, a magistrate of the county of Brant had exercised his jurisdiction, and committed the fugitive to gaol, with a view to his surrender. The latter was now brought up before the Queen's Bench, at Toronto, on a habeas corpus. The difference between the above expressions in inverted commas appears, from Chief Justice Robinson's judgment, to have afforded ground for an argument by the fugitive's counsel that, although there might be evidence sufficient to justify an apprehension and commitment for trial, there was not sufficient to sustain the charge. But the Chief Justice held that nothing more was meant by the one form of expression than by the other. He considered the intention to be, that the judge who has heard the testimony is to determine whether the evidence of criminality, if fully credited by a jury, and not refuted in any essential point, is such that it can be truly said that the facts are strong enough, and the proof clear enough, according to the laws of the province, to sustain the charge. This necessarily opened up the main argument on the fugitive's behalf—namely, that all the circumstances which might have influenced the party in committing the act, should be regarded as within the cognizance of the jury. But such a construction seemed to the Chief Justice to exact that there should be a similarity between the law of the state from which the person has fled, and the law of the country of refuge in all the features and attributes of the crime. To some extent he admitted that the laws should correspond; as, for instance, that, if by the law of Missouri the killing by a slave of his master in self defence were murder, there should not be extradition in such an event. In the case of this fugitive, his pursuer, Digges, the man killed, had it appears, authority to take him up, according to the law of the state. Digges was not abusing such authority, when Anderson rushed upon him and stabbed him. Therefore that the killing was not justifiable; and that, as between murder and manslaughter, it would be for the jury to dispose of the charge. Mr. Justice M'Lean, while he considered that in the particular case there had not been a sufficient charge of murder, nor a proper hearing and determination on evidence, and that the commitment was informal and defective—points which we may pass by as having only a special bearing—differed from the Chief Justice, on the ground that the offence stated in the warrant was not one for which the prisoner was liable to be detained according to the law of the province. This opinion, we may conclude from the accompanying remarks of the judge, was not formed upon the technical words of the warrant, that the fugitive did "wilfully, maliciously, and feloniously stab and kill," but upon the circumstances of the homicide. Mr. Justice M'Lean argued that the law of the British Empire not only does not recognise slavery but imposes on British subjects owning slaves the severest penalties. "Could it be expected from any man indulging the desire to be free, which nature has implanted in his breast, that he should quietly submit to be returned to bondage and to stripes, if by any effort of his strength, or by any means within his reach, he could emancipate himself?" In Mr. Justice M'Lean's judgment, the prisoner was justified in using any necessary degree of force to prevent what to him must inevitably have proved a most fearful evil. All our sympathies and all the sympathies of every one in the British Empire will go with this judgment. Were law a matter of sympathy, we might shut our eyes to the perplexities of its international administration between a free and a slave country. But if an extradition treaty is in fact made between two such states, the free country knowing the while that slavery exists lawfully in the other, no amount of hatred for slavery can relieve us from the difficulty that, on the broadest view of the obligations created, the unlawfulness of slavery in the free state cannot more imply an exclusion from the treaty of homicides arising out of the slavery, than the knowledge by the free country of the lawfulness of slavery in the other imply an inclusion of such homicides. The third judge, Mr. Justice Burns, having concurred with the Chief Justice, there was to be an appeal to the Court of Appeal; and, if necessary on the fugitive's behalf, a further appeal to the Privy Council was intimated.

STATISTICS OF THE COURTS OF DIVORCE, PROBATE, ECCLESIASTICAL, ADMIRALTY, JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL, AND HOUSE OF LORDS FOR 1859.

The Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, which has had transferred to it from the Ecclesiastical Courts a jurisdiction in all suits and proceedings in matters matrimonial, is now in the fourth year of its existence. Its returns are as follows:—

Petitions filed:—

In forma pauperis	3
For nullity of marriage	2
For dissolution of marriage	211
For judicial separation	80
For restitution of conjugal rights	9
For jactitation of marriage	—

Judgments given:—

By the full Court	154
By the judge ordinary	48
Applications for new trial	2

There were no applications for reversal of decree, and no appeals to the House of Lords. The fees amounted to £2,414 3s. The report states that the returns do not show the state of the business before the Court, but that it may be estimated from the fact, that in 1858 proceedings were commenced in 352 cases, and judgments given in 52 only, and that in 1859 proceedings were commenced in 306 cases, and judgments given in 202 cases. As these, however, were the first years of the operation of this judicature, we may assume that the proportion of judgments to proceedings will in future be greater than these returns indicate. In 262 of these cases, the causes of suit, as alleged, occurred before the passing of the Act, August 28th, 1857. All the expenses of the Court are paid by means of stamps used in the Court of Probate and Divorces. In 1858 these amounted to £46,092 12s. 3d.

To prevent collusion in this court, the plaintiff should be required in all causes to prove the existence of merit on his side, as well as of misconduct on the part of the defendant. It is also suggested that there should be a citation of the Attorney-General; the public being more concerned in the practical administration of this judicature than it is as to rights of patent, or legitimacy, in which causes the intervention of the Attorney-General on behalf of the public has been deemed necessary. The prevention of domestic strife and personal violence is one of the objects of the Act likely enough to be accomplished. But, on the other hand, the Act operates as a bounty on immorality, and, although the safeguards we have mentioned may be useful, we doubt whether even these will be sufficient checks to collusion. The Act indicates a social revolution in our law. For 300 years previous to its passing, only 365 cases of divorce occurred. The rich man, therefore, had virtually under the old law only a theoretical privilege, as it was kept in check by social considerations, which are not at present found to operate with any considerable efficacy amongst the increased numbers admitted to a participation in this doubtful boon. The Act, therefore, is not so much an extension of the privilege of a class, as it is the grant of a new right, which may finally be found to weaken the most important social ties of every class in the state.

The proceedings of the Court of Probate, established by a statute of the same session that instituted the Court of Divorce, are returned by the chief registrar for the principal registry, and by the district registrars for the forty local registries. The proceedings in the Court and for the principal registry were, in the year 1859, as follows:—

Total number of probates granted	8,069
Administrations	4,541
Caveats	892
Appearances	237
Motions	595
Petitions	11
Causes	439
Trials by special jury	12
Trials by common jury	15
Causes heard by judge only	29
Probates and administrations granted:—
On hearing of causes	54
On motion	238
On summons	7
Causes in progress at the end of the year	111
Revocations of probate or administration	35
Total amount of fees in court and contentious business (estimated)	£2,685
Total amount of taxed costs	£8,012

Of the above 439 causes, the greater number was disposed of by motion in court, and 81 by orders on summons. In the latter cases, 7 excepted, probate or administration was granted by the registrar's order. The district registrars, within their own districts, have power to grant probate or administration in common form; that is, in non-contentious cases; and in contentious cases, upon the decision of the County Court.

The total of the business of the district registries in 1859 was as follows:—

Probates granted in common form	13,874
Letters of administration granted in same manner	4,870
Probates granted under direction of judge	19
Letters of administration granted in same manner	5
Caveats against grants of probate or letters of administration	288
Caveats refused under direction of judge	—
Probates granted on decrees of county courts	1
Letters of administration granted in same manner	1
Number recalled or varied on decrees of county courts	—
Total amount of fees received	£53,521
Amount of duty stamps for probate and administration	£452,563

A convenient place for a registry is a practical desideratum for the requirements of this court.

The administration of assets has been always considered as savouring of equity, the comprehensiveness of suits in chancery, as to parties, being adapted to a complete and effectual distribution of assets, whether testamentary, bankrupt, or arising from the produce of incumbered estates. Hence, in addition to the division of judicial labour into the two branches of law and fact, as suggested by us in a former paper, the administration of assets among numerous parties, being dependant mainly upon questions of law, appears to be an adjunct of that jurisdiction which is chiefly engaged in determining issues of law. If the foregoing principles be correct, and they are certainly in harmony with the current of legal opinion at the present day, the administration of testamentary assets would appear in principle to be rightly appropriated to courts of equity. There is, therefore, some argument for a complete consolidation of the Court of Probate with the Court of Chancery, which is somewhat sanctioned by the existing partial fusion. It is an inconvenient arrangement, that the Court of Chancery should, as at present, determine the rights of parties to property, and that the Court of Probate should control the right to administration, which is a privilege mainly consequential upon the former. If, then, the Court of Chancery rightly possesses a jurisdiction as to the distribution of testamentary assets, which few, we think, will deny, why should it not also enjoy the incidental power to determine the right to administration?

The business of the Ecclesiastical Courts has been sufficiently meagre since the transference of its chief jurisdiction to the Court of Divorce and the Court of Probate. The only ecclesiastical courts now exercising judicial powers are the Arches Court for the province of Canterbury and for the province of York, and the Consistory Court for each diocese. The business of the Court of Faculties, and of the Court of Peculiars, is virtually only ministerial. The judicial proceedings of the Arches Courts and the Consistorial Courts are hardly worth noting. There were 15 suits in matters of church rates; but in none of the other classes of cases, of which these courts take cognizance, did the number of causes exceed 2. The total number of these suits was 29. As to suits for faculties, 73 were instituted for altering, or rebuilding, churches. The total number of suits of this class, including 4 for pew seats, was 85. In 79 of these cases faculties were decreed. The total amount of fees on all the above suits was £281.

The returns of the Registrar of the High Court of Admiralty are very full and complete as to the business of that court. The causes in 1859 were as follows:—

	Causes pending at commencement of year.	Causes instituted.	Amount at which causes were entered.
Salvage	31	137	£153,430
Damage by collision	71	182	223,985
Bottomry	14	46	61,650

Statistics afford a strong light to estimate the relative merits of courts having concurrent jurisdiction, such as the common law courts and Court of Admiralty have in all cases, except that of prize. The court preferred by suitors, we may rest assured, is more effective than its less favoured rival. Until the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, the common law courts had from the time of Lord Coke progressively narrowed the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. Lord Coke, it appears, was jealous of it, as he was of the jurisdiction of Chancery, and the prejudice seems to have descended to his successors. The Act referred to has altered this, and the court now enjoys its full rights concurrently with the common law courts in all marine cases, while it continues to have the peculiar jurisdiction already mentioned. This court has power to arrest the ship. The suit being in such cases in rem, there is an obvious desirableness in local jurisdiction to render such rights on the part of creditors effectual over property which may be so readily shifted. It is also, perhaps, an unnecessary hardship upon suitors that, in any class of marine cases, the parties aggrieved must initiate and try their suits in London, although the cause of action may have occurred on the coast of Cheshire or of Cornwall. A special jurisdiction certainly appears necessary for cases so technical as marine matters are, or rather courts with concurrent jurisdiction would sufficiently provide for the best determination of all causes. But under any mode of jurisdiction, a local judicature appears the most essential requisite for the cheap and speedy administration of justice in admiralty matters, the right of appeal being reserved to the court in London for such classes of cases as might require special knowledge in the judge. The criminal jurisdiction of this court was taken from it by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 2, and is now vested in the Central Criminal Court. The most numerous class of cases which the Court of Admiralty is called upon to decide are those of collision. However unnecessary it may be to stimulate our judges to an honourable rivalry with one another, yet the existence of concurrent jurisdictions, whose working is testified by statistical records, operates as a wholesome spur to ambition for a high place in the public estimation, and also as a test of their relative claims to still further promotion; although there is, doubtless, some risk resulting from the temptation to hurry through their judicial business, for the sake of making a good figure in the annual returns.

The total number of appeals entered in 1859 before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was 59; of these 7 were dismissed for non-prosecution, and 37 heard and determined. Judgment was affirmed in 16 and reversed in 16. The amount of the Council Office fees was £626 19s. 6d.; the amount of costs taxed £11,348. Sixty-six appeals remained for hearing at the end of the year.

The judicial proceedings of the House of Lords for 1859 consisted of the following appeals and causes in error:—

From the Court of Chancery—

England	20

From the Court of Exchequer Chamber—

England	9
Ireland	1

From the Court of Session—

Scotland	25
----------	----

From the Court of Probate—

England	1
Ireland	—

From the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial

Of these appeals 18 were dismissed for want of prosecution and for incompetency, and only 36 were heard. Of the cases heard, 20 were affirmed simply, 4 affirmed with declarations, 3 reversed simply, and 6 reversed with declarations. Forty-nine cases remained for hearing at the end of the year. The total amount of the fees was £2,023.

These returns conclude the judicial statistics for the year 1859. They appear to us to deserve great praise for their simplicity and lucid arrangement. We do not think that the incorporation of many other particulars besides those which they at present contain, would be useful. Social philosophy may desire voluminous data, but the law reformer, whose sphere is more limited, had better not incumber his thoughts with reflections upon varied or minute details. The present returns comprise, we think, all the most necessary statistics. The periods of judicial sittings should, however, in future be distinctly recorded for each court. We could thus determine more easily to what cause the existence of large arrears should be referred. This observation is also applicable in an especial manner to our courts of appeal. Ballads, are not, indeed, superior in force to laws, as is often alleged, but the judicial is more important than the legislative because it has a more extensive sphere of action. The law operates only through the judicial; and this latter function of Government, in all its departments, is most powerfully influenced by the conduct of the Supreme Court of Appeal, just as political economists tell us that the price of all corn is regulated by the price of that which is produced at the greatest expense. A knowledge, therefore, of all particulars relating to judicial sittings, especially in courts of appeal, which enjoy only a divided attention from the members of the bench in this respect, is an essential element for our consideration of the actual working of the law.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barriater-at-law.)

III.

OF THE DIFFERENT KINDS OF DOMICIL.

Domicils are of four kinds: first, domicil of origin, secondly, domicil of birth; thirdly, domicil by operation of law, and, fourthly, domicil of selection. Some domicils are called necessary, and these probably would come within the third class; these are, those of a wife, an infant, a servant, a student, a prisoner, an exile, a servant of the Crown, a domestic servant, an emigrant, an apprentice, a lunatic, and some others; but these would more properly, I think, be described by the word compulsory. It is very doubtful whether a man can have a domicile of origin different from his domicile of birth; for, up to the time when he attains his majority, his domicile would follow that of his father, unless he were illegitimate, in which case, although a minor, his domicile would refer to the country in which he was born, and so far be a domicile of origin and not of birth only. A domicile of birth does not properly arise during minority, but being acquired by birth would become a domicile of origin if continued after the party came of age; but domiciles of origin, and the fact of birth or death in a particular country, are in the nature of derniers resorts, and never called into play, except in the absence of all others. Domicile, by operation of law, would include all those cases where the act of the party has no hand in creating the domicile; thus the domicile of an illegitimate child would be by operation of law, the domicile of a person born on board of a ship would be by operation of law as belonging to the country to which the ship belonged, &c.,—see Vattel, p. 102, s. 216. Domicile of selection would be, where a party actually became a resident with the intention to remain, and chose that particular locality as his home. The third class, as I have said, are divided into what I shall call compulsory domiciles, and which I have treated of at large in another place. And, first, a wife's legal existence, except in some few particulars, is merged in that of her husband, and these very exceptions, which cannot arise unless under express provision, shew the truth of the general assertion. But none of these exceptions, as, where she has property to her separate use, where she has a power of appointment over property, where she possesses real estate, &c., affect the question of domicile; for a wife, ordinarily speaking, resides with her husband, and therefore his domicile would be her domicile, and unless she were separated à vinculo matrimonii, when she would cease to be a wife, her residence in a particular place could not affect her legally; because the mere effect of a deed of separation, or a separation à mensa et thoro, would not interfere with the legal bond; for, I apprehend, the general law looks only at general rights according to that law, and until these general rights are interfered with, which they could not be by private agreement, or by anything which does not touch the legal tie, the legal consequences of that tie follow and remain as they subsisted the moment after the marriage. As is well known according to our law a certain period (three weeks or three sabbaths) must elapse of continued residence by one of the parties, in a parish where a marriage is to take place, before the parties can be married by banns; and this rule finds a parallel in the Code Civile, 74th art., where it is provided that "the marriage shall be celebrated in the commune in which one or other of the parties shall be domiciled (see Robins v. Paxton, 6 W. R., 457), and the domicile, as regards the marriage, shall be established by six months' continued habitation within the same commune." The domicile of an infant follows that of its parents, as, in the ordinary case, the domicile of both would be the same; but if the child be posthumous, the then residence of the mother would be the domicile of origin or birth of the child; and this would apply to an illegitimate offspring, for although a bastard (that is, a child not born in lawful wedlock according to our law), is hæres neminis, filius or filia nullius, yet, for the purpose of domicile that rule can only apply to the father, because he is not legally his father, however certain and notorious the fact of his paternity may be; but this cannot be the case with the mother, for, whatever doubt there may be whose son or daughter it is on the father's side there cannot be any, ordinarily speaking, on the mother's. With respect to the case of a prisoner, if his imprisonment be for any crime which does not create the absolute forfeiture of his property, real and personal, such as treason and crimes of that nature, or of his personalty as felony (vid. Harrop's Estate, 5 W. R., p. 449), there can be no doubt as to his domicile being that of the country in which he is imprisoned. The same observations apply to the case of an exile, or one banished from his native country for some crime; but this could only apply to the case of one exiled for life, for unless the party exiled for a term confirms his compulsory domicile thus acquired by acts sufficient for the purpose, his former domicile would immediately revert on his return to the country from which he was exiled or banished. The case of a servant would stand somewhat on the same footing, except that his domicile is not so compulsory as in the cases of prisoners or exiles, but rather may be called a domicile of selection, although circumstances may create such a pressure as to make it in a manner involuntary or that in which his will has little or no concern. As appendant to this is the case of a servant of the Crown; and this branch may be divided into two classes—those who hold a direct office under Government, and are constantly engaged in the performance of active duties, and those who are in the pay of Government, but not performing any duty, and under the liability only to be called upon at any moment to serve. Many cases have occurred which have received judicial decision coming under both of these heads, and chiefly respecting military men, who, either being on service, were transferred from station to station and country to country, or being in the receipt of half-pay followed some other calling; but up to the time of death continued to receive pay, got leave of absence extended from time to time, and died without ever having been called upon to serve.

In the first case it would be difficult to say that a domicile could be acquired by ever so lengthened a residence, where there was a liability to change it at any moment, and that at the will too of another power, over which the party himself could have no control; but still this is certainly a compulsory or necessary domicile, and if a person thus circumstanced remained or rather resided a number of years in one country, although perhaps not in the same place, and died there, that country would certainly be his domicile. On the other hand, it has been held that the mere extension of leave and continuance of half-pay from time to time did not prevent a domicile being acquired in another country than that by the Government of which the half-pay was granted, because the mere neglect of an application for leave would have forfeited the commission and dissolved the tie at any moment; Cockrell v. Cockrell, 4 W. R., p. 730. Having thus touched lightly upon the different kinds of domicile, I shall next proceed to consider what it is which constitutes the thing itself.

Vid. Vattel's Law of Nations, p. 203.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A DOMICIL.

We have seen the etymology of the word "domicile," that it is a "house of residence," and not only so, but a house in which it is the intention of the party permanently to reside, and probably the shortest and truest meaning of the word is expressed by the one syllable "home," although no doubt that again depends upon what is considered as "home." We have also seen what is an abandonment, what is an acquirement of a domicile, and what is a domicile ab origine aut nativitate. We now come to a thing apart from all these, namely, what is necessary to constitute a domicile? To possess a domicile the necessary ingredients are, residence, and intention; and it is therefore a sequitur, that for the purpose of residing there must not only be the act called residence, but the thing called a residence; and I think, at this present period, it must be assumed that there is some kind of property in that residence to make it a domicile. On the other hand, intention may be manifested almost without the possession of property, although the proof in that case is of a very negative nature, that is, where a party having acquired an undoubted domicile in one country either by birth or act of his own, abandons but does not lose such domicile; but does not acquire another, in which case we are compelled to prefer the best of two very unsatisfactory states of circumstances. However, it generally happens that a man has some species of "home" in some country, and if he has not, yet possesses or retains some species of property, which raises an inference that he intended at some period to return to this spot and there permanently abide, or at all events, that he has never had an intention to abide or reside anywhere else. Of course, if a man possesses no property, no question of the sort can arise: because there is nothing whereon the law of any country can act, as it is in consequence of the possession of property and upon that possession that the law of domicile arises. In the case of Cochrane v. Cochrane (now subsisting under the title of Lord v. Colvin), Sir Launcelot Shadwell, the late Vice-Chancellor of England, decided that the retention of furniture was a sufficient *indiciu*m to fix the domicile as Scotch, and expressed that to be his opinion upon general principles and specially as showing the animus redeundi, including of course the animus manendi, when the former animus had become a factum, and which might be assumed as a natural or rather as a highly probable consequence; but also upon this further principle that the domicile had been Scotch, and was not displaced by another on the fact of the retention of furniture which was in fact tantamount to a retention of a domicile which had been acquired, and was prevented by this circumstance from being lost. This case occurred in May, 1848, and was argued upon exceptions, but is unreported, except in the public press; and it is worthy of notice that in the case referred to, not only did the present Vice-Chancellor, Sir John (then Mr.) Stuart, give an opinion that the domicile was Scotch, but the present Vice-Chancellor Kindersley has at the hearing decided it to be Scotch. The soundness of this decision, I think, cannot be called in question, and hence a fortiori, if the possession of furniture is sufficient to support a domicile, the possession of a house and land would be, even though there were no immediate appliances sufficient to enable the party actually there and then to reside, annexed to it. Nay more, in the case of Attorney-General v. Fitzgerald, 4 W. R., p. 797; it was held by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, that the leaving books and trunks was sufficient among other indicia to constitute a retention of an English domicile. The length of residence has always been thought an important substratum whereon to build a domicile; no doubt, for the obvious reason, that whatever the intention of the person may have been, that is, at all events, a substantive fact, or in other words, an act done sufficient per se to constitute a domicile, or if not, wanting very slight circumstances conjoined with it, to do so. In this sense, however, I imagine that the length of time must be considerable (for I know of no actual limit which has been fixed by decision, except in the case of Bremer v. Bremer, 1 Denne, 192, where in the course of Sir John Dodson's judgment there is this passage:—"Time alone will not constitute a domicile; a person may remain for fifty years in a particular place with an intention to return, and the original domicile is not considered to have been abandoned, and undoubtedly this is quite true." Long residence in one place is a material ingredient from which intention may be collected; but it is also absolutely necessary that there should be evidence of some sort of animus, although of course the longer the residence, the less necessary is the amount of animus. Whereas, supposing a house and land are taken, furniture purchased, and servants regularly hired, either where it is on a twenty-one years' or some long lease, or where the property is purchased out and out, a much shorter time would be sufficient, supposing at the time of the death under such circumstances, there was nothing to show an intention permanently to break up such establishment, and therefore, a mere residence, even of some months elsewhere, and leaving the establishment of servants upon board wages, would not prevent there being still sufficient to constitute a domicile, vid. Forbes v. Forbes, 1 Kay, p. 341. It is scarcely possible to conceive a case in which one solitary fact could create a domicile (except in the cases of necessary domiciles treated of in another chapter), and therefore is it that every minute circumstances attending the conduct and position of the party is so requisite to be brought forward. It oftentimes happens that there may be indicia, many in number, and yet it is still doubtful whether they constitute a domicile; but the addition of one circumstance, of some weight, completes as it were the necessary sum total and constitutes the domicile, and this circumstance in Forbes v. Forbes was the residence of the wife. It would, perhaps, be very difficult to enumerate all the circumstances necessary to create a domicile, but the guide to determine what circumstances are necessary, is that, coupled with facts, there must be some circumstance or circumstances to show an intention permanently to reside, and after all that is the key-stone upon which the whole question turns. It is not necessary for the purpose of proving a domicile in any particular country that a residence should be proved to exist in any particular portion of or place in that country; it being enough that a domicile having been there acquired, no domicile has been acquired elsewhere, or that there are indicia to show an intention at some time or other to return to and reside in it, and therefore I think it is clear upon this principle, that where a party is possessed of property sufficient for a residence in one country, but procures tenants for it and spends his time in travelling from place to place abroad (a common case), his domicile is still subsisting in the country wherein his property is situated. A question has often been raised with regard to persons in the service of Government; and as bearing upon this question the case of Brown v. Smith, at the Rolls (21 Law Journ. N. S. 356), is a somewhat singular one. In that case William Cornborough Watt, a Scotchman by birth, and a surgeon by profession, came to England and was appointed hospital mate at Haslar hospital; he afterwards acted as assistant-surgeon and surgeon on board of various vessels of the Royal Navy during several years, as also on board several convict ships, and twice during these periods, being on half pay, he visited Scotland, and remained there up to the time of being again on service, but ultimately, being on the Malta station, he there died. At this time he had entirely removed every article of property he possessed, and likewise his sister and only relation, from Scotland, on the last occasion of his visiting that country; but the Master of the Rolls thought that he had not lost his Scotch domicile, and decided accordingly. This, no doubt, is a very strong case; but it only carries out the principles I have endeavoured to evolve, namely, that where a domicile has been acquired, and subsists ipso facto; until another is acquired, such domicile of acquirement or origin is not lost, although it may be apparently abandoned. The latest case upon this part of the question is that of Cockrell v. Cockrell, 4 W. R., p. 730; where the Crown claimed legacy duty on the ground of an English domicile. The circumstances were shortly these. The testator, Mr. Cockrell, being on half pay and invalided from his Majesty's ship Weazel, went to Calcutta, where he founded the well-known house of Cockrell & Co., and amassed a fortune of nearly £200,000 in the course of ten years, married, had children and died there; and it appeared that he had from time to time obtained leave of absence from our Government, and still retained his half pay up to the time of his death. In this state of things he made his will, and left large legacies, &c.; and legacy duty being payable if his domicile was English, but not if it was Anglo-Indian, the matter was contested with some energy. The Vice-Chancellor took time to consider the case, for the purpose of investigating the nature of the Admiralty orders; and as it appeared that the effect either of outstaying the leave of absence or neglecting to apply for further leave when one period was expired, would be simply a forfeiture of the half pay, his Honour thought it so very improbable that, had the occasion arisen, Mr. Cockrell would have elected to retain his half pay against such a profit as he was then making by his business, that he decided his intention to have been all along permanently to reside in India, although as long as he could, he had retained his half pay, and held accordingly that his domicile was Anglo-Indian and not English. This case, therefore, was decided on the intention as constituting the domicile joined with ten years' residence, and it cannot be doubted that the mere fact of being in the service of a Government, unless accompanied by permanent residence, will not of itself constitute a domicile; vid. Hodgson v. Beauchesne, 7 W. R. 397; and 33 L. T. 36. Coverture, minority, imprisonment and exile, may ipso facto, constitute a domicile; but this subject will be found discussed under the head of "compulsory domicile." Of the insufficiency of intention only to constitute a domicile there can be no doubt, and it has also been held that a testator's description of himself is not sufficient for that purpose. Vid. Whicker v. Hume, 13 Beav. 366, afterwards carried to the House of Lords, and which will be hereafter referred to.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Jan. 1.—The criminal business of the county of Middlesex was resumed this morning at the Sessions-house, on Clerkenwell-green, for the first time since the completion of the alterations, which appear to give great satisfaction to the public, and for the future the whole of the sessions business (excepting appeals) will be conducted at Clerkenwell.

The learned Assistant-Judge, Mr. Bodkin, presided; with Mr. Payne, deputy; Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench, and a great number of magistrates, were present.

The Lord Chancellor has ordered the name of Mr. Warde, of Clepton House, Warwick (who was the defendant in the action of Hooper v. Warde, recently tried in the Court of Queen's Bench), to be struck out of the commission of the peace for that county.

EQUITY.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR—RIGHT TO POLICY OF ASSURANCE AFTER PAYMENT OF DEBT.

Courtenay v. Wright, V. C. S., 9 W. R. 153.

There have been before the Court of late years several cases in which the question of the right of a creditor to retain a policy of assurance after the payment of his debt, has been discussed; but until lately there was hardly any express authority upon this point. A short review, therefore, of the decisions relating to it will not be without use.

It was decided in Burridge v. Rows (1 Y. & C. 183), that the voluntary payment of premiums on a policy of assurance, confers on the payer no interest in the policy; and according to Triston v. Hardey (14 Beav. 232), where a person effects a policy in his own name upon the life of another, declaring that the assurer is interested in the other's life, the fact that some of the premiums were paid by the other does not rebut the presumption that the policy belongs to the assurer. In Morland v. Isaacs (3 W. R. 397), a creditor insured his debtor's life, charging him, by consent, with the premiums. There was not any express contract as to the ownership of the policy; but the creditor admitted that he would have assigned the policy to the debtor, if requested to do so, upon payment of the debt; and the debtor having died, the question was to whom the proceeds of the policy belonged? There could be little doubt in such a case that the balance of the money so obtained, after payment of the debt and premiums, belonged to the estate of the debtor; and accordingly Sir J. Romilly, M.R., decided that the creditor was a trustee of this balance. In his judgment, his Honour refers to the distinction between the case of an annuitant and that of an ordinary creditor insuring a debtor's life, and charging him with the premiums. "If," said the Master of the Rolls, "an annuitant insures the grantor's life, the expense comes out of his own pocket, and is an equivalent for the loss he might otherwise sustain by the premature death of the grantor. The case of a creditor who makes the debtor pay the premiums is different." Since this decision an important case of an annuitant secured by a policy of assurance has come before the Court:—Gottlieb v. Cranch, 4 D. M. & G. 440. In that case a money lender agreed to advance a sum at £8 per cent. per annum, "besides insurance of the life" of the borrower, who executed a bond with sureties conditioned for the payment of an annuity during his life, equal to the aggregate sums of the annual percentage and premiums, there being a condition for the cesser of the annuity on payment of the sum advanced—but nothing was said as to the policy. The case was originally heard before the Vice-Chancellor Stuart, (see 17 Jur. 686.) who declared that the policy on payment of the original sum borrowed belonged to the borrower, being of opinion that the evidence showed that the bond was not an entire transaction in itself, but that the whole transaction was intended only to provide for the repayment of the sum lent, the object being merely a security and indemnity to the lender. The Lords Justices, however, decided on appeal that the borrower had no equity to have the policy delivered to him. The main ground of their lordships' decision was that the lender was an annuitant, and effected the policy for his own protection. "It generally or often happens," says Knight Bruce, L.J., "that when an annuity is purchased, the amount of the annuity, or the price to be given, is fixed on the principle of obtaining for the purchaser a certain amount per cent. for his purchase money, and enough also to insure on the ordinary terms the life on which the annuity depends;" and this being so their lordships were of opinion that there were no special circumstances in the case or contract between the parties to take it out of the general rule. Wherever, therefore, the intention is that the grantor of an annuity by way of security should have the advantage of a policy of assurance upon payment of his debt, there should be an express stipulation to that effect. At the same time it is not very easy to understand the equity which, in such a case as Gottlieb v. Cranch, gives to the lender not only the amount of his debt, but also a fund which admittedly was intended for his security only, and which was provided at the expense of the borrower.

The cases of annuitants, however, as has already been mentioned, are distinguishable from those of ordinary lenders, in which it is not so easy to arrive at anything like a definite principle. In Drysdale v. Pigott, 4 W. R. 518, Sir John Romilly, M.R., laid it down that where a creditor insures his debtor's life, the question whether the debtor was in his lifetime liable to repay to the creditor the amount of premiums paid by him, is the test by which the title to the policy money on the debtor's death is ordinarily to be determined; and this was in accordance with his Honour's decision in Morland v. Isaacs. In Drysdale v. Pigott, however, although the debtor paid the first premium he refused to pay the second which had been paid by the creditor. Under these circumstances the Master of the Rolls was of opinion that the policy was continued by the creditor for his own benefit; that he could not have compelled repayment of the premiums to him; and that therefore he was entitled to the proceeds of the policy. On appeal, however (5 W. R. 773), the Lords Justices held that the policy belonged to the estate of the debtor subject to the lien of the creditor for his payments in keeping it on foot upon the grounds that originally the policy belonged to the debtor; and, although by his refusal to pay subsequent premiums, he risked its destruction, yet that the creditor was to be regarded only as preserving by his payments his debtor's pledge, which would be for the benefit of the owner (the debtor) subject to the creditor's lien on it for his debt, and the expenses of its preservation. Turner, L.J., observed that the creditor "was mortgagee of a policy, and there was nothing to bar the right of the debtor to redeem, except the fact that when applied to for payment of the premium to keep the policy on foot, he refused to pay it." The same question in effect was raised in Lea v. Hinton, 19 Beav. 324, of which the marginal note is as follows:—"If A. effects a policy of assurance upon the life of B. to cover a debt due to him from B.; or if A. effects a policy in the name of B., in whose life he has no interest, the representatives of B.'s estate could have no claim upon it. But where there is a presumption from the dealings and transactions between the parties, that the policy was effected with the privity and concurrence, and on account of B., for the purpose of securing a debt due by B. to a third party, for which A. is surety, the onus is thrown upon A. of rebutting that presumption." In that case, A. had borrowed £300, and B., his solicitor, had joined with him in securing it. Very shortly afterwards, B. insured A.'s life in the name of B., after communications with A. The evidence being unsatisfactory at the hearing, and the Court being of opinion that the onus of proving the title was thrown on B., and he having failed to rebut the presumption that the policy was effected to secure the debt, it was held by Sir John Romilly, M.R., that the policy belonged to A.'s estate. It ought to be mentioned that the security in which B. joined was a joint and several promissory note which was of the same amount as the policy of assurance. Upon appeal the Lords Justices held that to the extent to which the insurance money was not required for indemnifying the surety it ought to be applied in payment of the debt. (See the observations of Knight Bruce, L.J., explanatory of his judgment in this case, 2 De G. & Jones, 595.)

In Courtenay v. Wright, the question arose between the grantor and grantee of a life annuity; and Stuart, V.C., in his judgment, thus states the principle which is to be extracted from Lea v. Hinton, and Drysdale v. Pigott. "Where," said his Honour, "the relation of debtor and creditor subsists, and the true construction of the instrument and the evidence of the real nature of the transaction shows that the policy of assurance was effected by the creditor as a security or indemnity, if the debtor substantially bears the expense of that security, he is, on a principle of natural equity, entitled to have the security delivered up to him when he pays his debt, which it was directly or indirectly at his expense effected to secure. This is an application of the maxim, 'Qui sentit onus sentire debet et commodum.'" The same principle is recognised by the civil law, as appears by the following passage in the Digest (30. 17. 10):—"Secundum naturam est, commodum cuiusque rei eum sequi quem sequuntur incommoda." The Vice-Chancellor distinguishes this case from Lea v. Hinton, and Drysdale v. Pigott, that in both of the latter the insurance was optional, and the creditor was not supplied beforehand by the debtor with money sufficient to defray the premiums, but that the payment of them by the creditor was optional, and made with his own money for a purpose beneficial to himself. The contrary would of course be the fact where provisions for the premiums was made by an annuity; and this distinction appears to be plainly founded on natural equity. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor, however, appears to be hardly reconcilable with Gottlieb v. Cranch.

COMMON LAW.

PROCEDURE—AMENDMENTS AT NISI PRIUS—15 & 16 VICT. c. 76, s. 222.

St. Losky v. Green, 9 W. R., C. P., 119.

There is probably no single section in the whole of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which worked a greater change in the system existing prior to that statute, than the 222nd, which (as it were) gathered up into a single proposition all the previous declarations of the Legislature in favour of common sense against mere technicalities, and provided in the most sweeping terms that "it should be lawful" for a judge, at all times, to amend all defects and errors in any proceeding in civil causes, whether there was anything in writing to amend by or not, and whether the defect or error were that of the party applying to amend or not, and that all such amendments might be made with or without costs, and upon such terms as to the court or judge should seem fit. And, not content with conferring these large permissive powers of amendment, the Act proceeds in the following way, "and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made."

Had this clause been acted upon according to the very liberal terms in which it was framed, and in the way in which it was probably intended by its original proposer to operate, it is obvious that considerable inconvenience would have followed in practice. There would have been a total cessation of all attempts at precision in the pleadings, or even in duly launching the case by placing the proper parties on the record, as plaintiffs and defendants. Hence the judges, instead of the litigants, would have been saddled with the burthen of laying the real matter to be decided before the jury—a result which would, also, have materially increased the expenses of both parties, by making it necessary for them to provide themselves with evidence for the trial which, after all, might turn out not to be material or required, at the risk of being met with some claim or defence for which they were totally unprepared. At the first outset, some attempt was in fact made to persuade judges under this provision of the new Act to make amendments which would have been attended with results of the nature just alluded to; but matters soon settled down to a more reasonable footing, and it was felt that, like other single texts, the 222nd section of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, was not capable of sound construction without referring to other parts, and the entire spirit and bearing of the statute of which it formed a part.

Mr. Justice Maule, with the acuteness for which he was so remarkable, was one of the first to perceive the necessity for some caution in construing the new powers of amendment given by the Act. In Wilkin v. Reed (15 C. B. 192), he refused to amend a declaration, by inserting therein an allegation which had become necessary to the plaintiff's success, owing to the evidence given at the trial, but which raised a new question not previously in the contemplation of the parties. The Court in banco held his decision to be right, and this doctrine has since been often acted on. It was also soon determined by all the three Courts, that notwithstanding the obligatory words at the end of the section, it is not imperative on the judge to add a pleading, whatever his obligation may be with regard to altering one already on the record. And they have also repeatedly intimated that they will seldom interfere with the discretion of a judge in refusing to amend (see, for example, the observations of the Court in Brennan v. Howard, 1 H. & N. 138). In consequence, probably, of this intimation, points for judicial decision upon this provision have been more rarely brought before the courts in banco, the parties being content with the decision of the judge presiding at nisi prius, where it forms a fertile resource for a speculative application by the losing parties (see Fost. & Fin., N. P. Rep. passim).

In the present case, an amendment under the following circumstances, which had been acceded to at nisi prius by Erle, C.J., was made the ground for an application for a new trial.

The action was by a consumer of coals against a coal merchant for delivering coals of a different and inferior description from those contracted for. And the defence was, that the plaintiff had agreed to the substitution. The terms used in the declaration described the whole quantity of coals contracted for, as being both screened and unscreened; which, of course, was manifestly inconsistent; but, inasmuch as the real question between the parties was whether the coals delivered were screened or not, the judge amended the declaration accordingly, and at the expense of the defendant. In taking this course, he was upheld by the Court, who at the same time took occasion to express their opinion—first, that under the provision of the Act, the judge was bound to correct the faulty description of the goods in the declaration, so as to make the pleadings fit the contract; and second, that in such a case, the costs of the amendment ought not to be paid for by the plaintiff if he succeeded generally in the cause, inasmuch as it must be taken that the defendant knew the real matter in dispute, and being aware of the blunder in the pleadings, was desirous to take advantage of the mistake.

PRACTICE—RENEWING WRIT TO SAVE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Bailey v. Owen, 9 W. R., B. C., 128.

In Cornish v. Hochin (1 Ell. & Bl. 602), an application was made to the Queen's Bench, to amend a writ of summons which (a writ for the same debt having been regularly sued out while the plaintiff's claim was alive, and having been continued by alias and pluries writs, according to the practice then in force, for the purpose of saving the Statute of Limitations), bore on it a faulty date, and one which made it appear to have issued when in fact it did not issue, i.e., when the first writ issued. The Court acceded to the application, though with some little hesitation, chiefly on the strength of the 222nd section of the Procedure Act, discussed in the account above given of St. Losky v. Green, for the real question between the parties (it was remarked) was, whether the suit was or was not barred by the Statute of Limitations. They intimated, however, that neither before nor since the Act would an amendment, with the object of saving the Statute of Limitations, be ordered, if it was sought thereby to make the record not conformable with the actual facts of the case.

In the present instance, they carried this resolution into effect; for an application was made to them to cause a writ to be revealed (according to the present practice of renewal) sine pro tunc, that is of such a date as would keep the action alive—the case being that the writ had not been, in fact, renewed in time, owing to the error of a clerk. This course the Court refused to authorise, observing that by so doing they would be extending the time for suing given by the Statute of Limitations; which, of course, was beyond their power.

By section 34 it is provided that the provisions of the Act "except as hereinbefore otherwise provided," shall only extend to deeds, wills, &c., after its date. I have gone through the Act, and cannot find any clause which is expressly made retrospective. I shall be obliged to any of your readers who can enlighten me by stating the clauses which are retrospective. Contrast sections 17 and 21 of the same Act as to receivers. Will not the 21st section (which regulates the salary, and provides that it may be fixed in the appointment, which section 17 provides, is to be made by the mortgagee), verbally render nugatory the provisions of the Act? Will not a mortgagee fix such an inadequate salary or commission as to prevent the receiver accepting the office?

See section 11 of the same Act. Suppose A. B. by a deed charges his estate, but does not hand over any deeds, and then creates an ordinary mortgage, and does hand over the deeds.—in what position would the second mortgagee be? Would it be negligence in the party having the charge that he did not get the deeds? Would he be able to sue the mortgagee, under section 16, for the deeds? Will not these provisions open the door to frauds?

Again. See sections 11 & 15. If the charge is a charge on a term only, and the party who gave the charge had the fee, can the fee be sold under section 15? The language of these sections is very large. B. P. A.

POOR LAW BOARDS AND ATTORNEYS. 22 & 23 VICT. CAP. 49, s. 5.

By this Act it is enacted that guardians shall not be required by any rule of law to pay the bill of any solicitor or attorney until the final determination of any suit or proceeding, or until he shall cease to be retained by them, but the bill of costs shall be duly taxed.

It is true that besides the above enactment there is a proviso that nothing contained in the Act shall prevent payments on account to an attorney; but why should solicitors and attorneys be compelled to wait the final determination of a suit or proceeding which may not be in their own control?

What do our two Law Societies say to this Bill having passed into law? B. P. A.

COPYHOLD MORTGAGE.

In answer to (X. Y. Z. see ante, p. 146), presuming that the enfranchisement in question was made with the consent of the copyhold commissioners, the effect of it will be to pass the legal estate to the tenant on the court rolls at the time of the enfranchisement, who in this case appears to be the mortgagee. The mortgagee had not the legal estate, but only a right to be admitted; he will, therefore, I apprehend, stand in the position of an equitable mortgagee upon the freeholds. The endorsement upon the conditional surrender by the mortgagee of the repayment of the mortgage money, would, I should think, be a sufficient discharge. I cannot find anything in the 46th section of the Copyhold Act, 1852, to make a deed necessary, A. G. P.

BIRKENHEAD.—The Birkenhead Street Railway: The right of the road.—At the Birkenhead Police-court, on Thursday the 27th ult., James Connolly, a cab-driver, appeared in answer to a summons charging him with having wilfully obstructed one of the Birkenhead Street Railway Company's omnibuses, and also with having assaulted Joseph Garrow, the conductor of the omnibus. From the evidence of Garrow, who was the complainant, it appeared that on the morning of the 12th ult., having changed horses at the Park end, he was proceeding on his journey along the railway towards the ferry terminus. Just as he was about to start the defendant drove his horse and car on to the line of rails. In doing so he was about 100 yards in front of the omnibus, and was proceeding at a walking pace. Witness had to stop his omnibus in consequence of the slow pace at which the defendant was going, and he went to the latter and requested him either to move quicker or to draw to one side, in order that the omnibus might be allowed to pass. Instead of doing either, the defendant turned round and laughed at him, and then struck him with his whip across the shoulders. The same slow pace was maintained by the defendant until he reached Bridge-street, about fifty yards from the ferry terminus, at which point he went off the rails. In consequence of being so hindered, the omnibus, which had been impeded by the defendant for about a mile, was considerably later in reaching the ferry than it should have been, and many of the passengers missed the boat. The facts were not disputed, and the question resolved itself into one of "right of way." It was contended on the part of the complainant, that under the Birkenhead Improvement Act, which constituted them surveyors of high-roads, the Birkenhead Commissioners had power so to alter, amend, and construct those roads as they thought would add to the public convenience; and also that they were empowered to try experiments with the view of facilitating the passage of vehicles. The complainant, it was stated, was proceeding on the only part of the road he could use, whereas the defendant, who wilfully obstructed his progress, could at once have allowed him to pass by going on one side, without trouble or inconvenience to himself. On the part of the defendant it was contended that the commissioners had no right to authorise the laying down of a line of rails along the roads. The defendant was proceeding along the highway in the ordinary manner, which he had an undoubted right to do, and if the complainant wished to pass him he should have done so by driving to one side, and not have expected the defendant to move aside for him. After a brief consultation the magistrates dismissed the charge of obstructing the complainant. The charge of assault was then withdrawn. Notice of appeal was given. [For an exposition of the law upon this novel point see Foreign Tribunals, ante p. 70.]

BIRMINGHAM.—The following is a copy of the circular addressed by the Town Clerk to the principal boroughs in England and Wales, numbering about 135. The replies received lead to the expectation that a powerful influence will be brought to bear on Parliament when the question comes before it:—"Birmingham, November 28th, 1860. Dear Sir,—I beg to call your especial attention to the reports of the application made by the Solicitor-General to the Court of Queen's Bench on the 8th instant, for a rule calling upon the justices of this borough to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to concede to the Mayor the right he claimed to preside at all sessions and meetings of the justices, by virtue of the precedence conferred upon him by the 57th section of the 5th & 6th William 4th, cap. 76. I venture to call your attention to the interpretation put upon the section in question by their lordships, and particularly by the Lord Chief Justice, who considered that the precedence 'in all places' thereby conferred upon the Mayor was merely social precedence; as, for example, that he would be entitled to go first into a room, and the like. Now it is quite clear that on all occasions social precedence would be readily accorded to all gentlemen holding the office of Mayor, and would continue to be accorded to them by all persons with whom they might come in contact, of mere courtesy and politeness, in the absence of any enactment on the subject. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive the effect or utility of any enactment conferring mere social precedence, as it is described by the Lord Chief Justice. It is still more difficult to conceive that it could have been the intention of the Reformed Parliament which enacted the Municipal Corporations Act to confer such precedence upon the mayors of boroughs as that described by the Lord Chief Justice. That Act was passed for the abolition of the alleged corruption and the unnecessary paraphernalia and parade of the old corporations, and it is not very likely that at such a time and in such a mood the Commons would consider it necessary to give a dinner-party precedence to the high public functionary they were creating by the Act referred to. Under the circumstances, some decided action is necessary, and to that end I shall be glad to be informed that your corporation will be prepared in the next session of Parliament to assert the right of your Mayor to the position so rightfully claimed by the Mayor of Birmingham, and to join a deputation of the whole of the Mayors and Town Clerks of the kingdom, to the Home Office, for the purpose of vindicating and restoring (if possible) by legislation the privilege intended to be conferred by Parliament upon the people's magistrate. I am, dear sir, yours truly, THOMAS STANDBRIDGE, Town Clerk."

WAKEFIELD.—At the West Riding Christmas Sessions, held in this town on the 1st inst., the subject of the salaries of coroners was brought before the Court. The Finance Committee had taken into consideration the Act providing for the payment of coroners by salaries instead of fees, which came into force that day. The Act provided that the salaries should be fixed on the average of the fees of the five years ending December 31st, 1860; and the committee considered that they should be paid according to the Act. The coroners, at a consultation they had had with the committee, wanted to bring the disallowed fees into the average, but that the committee would not assent to. If the coroners were dissatisfied, however, they could appeal to the Treasury. The coroners who were present were asked if they had any objection to the course proposed, and Mr. T. Taylor said that for his part he could not as a matter of principle accept the average. He had fees disallowed which ought to be allowed. He did not wish, however, to make the question merely a pecuniary one; and he should, therefore, be content with a slight advance on the average. He should for instance be content to receive £150 per annum. After a short discussion, it was arranged that the coroners and the committee should have another conference on the subject. It is stated that the question has been postponed to the adjourned sessions at Sheffield, in the hope that some settlement may be arrived at which will render an appeal from the coroners to the Treasury unnecessary.

YORK.—Our readers will recollect that during the recent assizes a jury were locked up, owing to their foreman dissenting from the opinions of his fellows. It is stated that the jury did not fare so badly as refractory jurymen generally do—that they had the advantage of gas and fire, and were kindly supplied by the High Sheriff with tea. Notwithstanding these concessions to their comfort, the feelings of the jurymen may well be imagined, locked up, as it is stated they were, through the obstinacy of an ignorant or prejudiced foreman. It is rumoured that their remarks upon that individual were by no means courteous, and that when he made preparations for a comfortable night by reclining on a couple of chairs, and commenced eating some monster sandwiches, evidently provided for such a contingency, their indignation reached a climax. The night became bitterly cold, and to keep themselves warm the prisoners had to stamp about the room. Any man with tobacco and a pipe or a pocket flask would have been looked upon as an angel of mercy. The colder it grew the more frantic were the jurymen, and the stronger their denunciation of their torturer, who was gradually subsiding into a slumber, betraying symptoms of an asthmatical affection. Here was an opportunity for revenge! Accordingly, some paper was ignited, and whenever the foreman slumbered he was smoked into a severe fit of coughing. But the fire burnt low and threatened to expire—and towards dawn the cold became so severe, that longing glances were cast at the books, bookcases, and massive table. Fuel was the great want, and, fortunately, a deal-box was espied in a corner. It was immediately smashed open and disclosed a complete set of burglar's instruments—ready for a case which was to come on next day. This served again to kindle the fire, and the jury managed to exist till morning, when they were discharged; not, however, until they had heard themselves roundly abused by the county policeman, to whom the box belonged.

SUPREME COURT, CEYLON.

APPEAL FROM COURT OF REQUESTS, JAFFNA.

(Present—Sir EDWARD S. CREASY, C.J., the Hon. Mr. Justice MORGAN.)

The following judgment contains an interesting discussion on the difference between the English and the Roman-Dutch law as to the liability of the owners of ferocious animals.

Judgment.—Folkard v. Anderson.—This is an action brought on account of injuries which the plaintiff sustained from some dogs belonging to the defendant. Evidence was adduced before the Commissioner of the Court of Requests, as to the ferocious habits of the dogs; but he considered that there was no sufficient proof of the owner's being aware of their ferocity. We agree with him in thinking the proof, as to this point insufficient. The commissioner dismissed the case, holding that proof of the owner's knowledge of the dogs' mischievous habits (technically called proof of the scienter) is indispensable for the plaintiff's right to a verdict. According to English law the commissioner's judgment would be correct. The English courts hold that "the gist of the action is the keeping of the animal after knowledge of its mischievous propensities" (see the judgment of Lord Denman, C. J. in May v. Burdett 9 Q. B. 101). But according to the Roman-Dutch Law, which we are bound to follow, the decision ought to have been the other way. The Roman-Dutch law does not require a man, who has been injured by the mischievous animal of another man, to prove that the owner knew the animal's mischievous habits. This difference between the two systems of jurisprudence is pointed out by Lord Campbell in the recent case of Gething v. Morgan. Lord Campbell there contrasted the law of Scotland (which like the Dutch law is founded upon the Roman, though the Dutch and Scotch systems are not in all respects the same) with the law of England; his lordship ruled indeed that the circumstances of the case then before him made the defendant liable, and showed sufficient proof of the scienter even according to the law of England: but his lordship added, "According to the law of Scotland there is no occasion to shew the ferocious habit of the animals or the scienter; and where an injury has been done to an innocent person, it certainly seems more reasonable that the loss should fall upon the owner of the animal which has done the mischief than upon the party injured." Lord Campbell in these expressions evidently alluded to the well known jural principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss ought to fall on the one by whose act or omission the loss has been occasioned. As the rules of law respecting the liability of owners of animals are matter of frequent practical importance, we have, in framing our judgment in this case, thought it desirable to deal more fully with the subject, than we should have done, if cases of this kind were more rare. It is a general rule of Roman-Dutch law, that the owner of a brute animal, which has injured another person, is liable for such injury, but the degree of liability varies, according to the nature and the habits of the animal, and the circumstances under which the injury was inflicted. The authorities on this part of the law are most fully collected in the commentary of Voet on the ninth book of the Pandects, title 1, "Si quadrupes pauperiem fecisse dicatur." Von Leewen in the 29th chapter of his fourth book, being the chapter "on obligations arising from causes similar to crime," is explicit on the subject. He also treats of it in the 31st chapter of his "Censura Forensis." To these may be added Vandevater's commentary on the ninth chapter of the fourth book of the Institutes; the commentary of Vinnius on the same, Gronewegen, "De legibus abrogatis," p. 54; and Grotius pp. 252, 253 of Herbert's translation. The most ancient of all the authorities and the foundation of a great part of the law on the subject, is a law of the twelve tables cited and incorporated in the Institutes and in the Digest. By the law an "actio de pauperie" was given to a person who had been injured by the brute animal of another, such brute animal being of a species not naturally mischievous to mankind. The owner of the animal was under an alternative liability. He was bound to make good the damage, or to give up to the injured person the animal that had done the injury. The Edictian edict forbade the keeping of savage animals in or near to a place of general resort and thoroughfare, so as to endanger the public. If such an animal, so kept, injured a freeman, the owner was bound to make full compensation, and could not release himself from such liability by giving up the animal. Without discussing here in detail the subsequent legislation of Rome and Holland on this subject, we may state the general results, as applicable to the administration of justice in Ceylon, to be as follows. Where a man's brute animal does an injury to another person (such injury not being done through mere accident, and not being provoked and caused by the wrongful act of the injured party, and not being immediately caused by the wrongful act of a third person) the owner is always liable. But the owner's liability is limited, if the animal were not of a species naturally savage, and if also the individual animal were not of mischievous habits. The limit of the liability of such an innocent owner is this: the amount to be given for compensation must not exceed the value of the animal which did the injury. But, if the animal were of a savage species or if though not of a savage genus, it were of mischievous habits, whether the owner knew those habits or not, the owner must make full compensation for the injury done by the animal, and cannot limit the damages to be assessed against him by the amount of the animal's value. There may be cases in which animals not mischievous by species or by habit may be kept in such places and under such circumstances as to make them dangerous to the public. If, in such cases injury is done by such animals, the owner is liable to make full compensation. Applying these principles to the present case, we find abundant evidence that the dogs were of mischievous habits. There is also evidence as to the place and mode in which they were kept, which might be important as to fixing full liability on their owner: but that full liability is already established by the evidence as to the mischievous habits of the dogs. It follows that there must be a verdict for the plaintiff. As the defendant's liability is not limited by the value of the dogs, there is no need to remit the case for any evidence as to this to be taken. It is proved that the amount of the plaintiff's doctor's bill was £3 15s. He asks in his plaint for this sum only, and it is therefore unnecessary to estimate what he might have recovered for personal suffering and annoyance. The judgment of the court is that the judgment of the commissioner be set aside, and that there be a verdict for the plaintiff for £3 15s. and costs.

Review.

A Treatise on the Liens of Attorneys, Solicitors, and other Legal Practitioners. By WHITLEY STOKES, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Sweet. 1860.

If the readers of this little volume estimate its merits as highly as its author does, he will have good reason to congratulate himself. A text book on any legal subject does not afford much ground for egotistic display; and the particular subject which Mr. Stokes has selected constitutes no exception to this general rule. Any topic, however, is sufficient for this purpose in the hands of some persons; and a treatise on the law of attorneys' liens, affords Mr. Stokes a sufficient opportunity for expressly or inferentially, throughout the course of 190 pages, informing the public of his superiority as a lawyer, not only over all preceding text writers on the same topic, but over the majority of judges who from time to time have been called upon to handle it. Thus we find him in the first page of his preface, alleging "the inaccuracy with which this subject is handled by some of the text writers," as a reason why such a work is wanted; he then proceeds to enumerate four of such alleged inaccuracies in his own language and without any reference to where they may be found; and winds up his short address to the reader by a little quotation modestly intimating his own advantage in one important respect over all his predecessors,—"C'est icy un livre de bonne foy, lecteur." As a specimen of the mode in which Mr. Stokes treats the judgments of the superior and even the highest courts, we may content ourselves with a reference to his observations on the recent well known case of Shaw v. Neale. We have not sufficient space to refer at length to his criticism on the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, although it would furnish a telling example of our author's style; but as to the "startling reason" on which Lord Chelmsford rested his judgment in the House of Lords in that case, Mr. Stokes says that it would, if valid, "convict the common law judges of folly in framing their rule as to set-off subject to the attorney's lien, and overturn a host of cases which constitute a body of jurisprudence not, perhaps, inferior in importance to the decision in Shaw v. Neale," (p. 125). Now, although we agree with Mr. Stokes in considering as untenable the alleged ground of Lord Chelmsford's decision, and that his lordship attributed to the term "lien" too limited a meaning; yet we think that Mr. Stokes would have exhibited better taste in discussing the language of the learned judge in a more ingenuous if not a more respectful manner. Mr. Stokes, however, flatters himself that he has discovered a "lapseus lingue" of Vice Chancellor Wood (p. 38, note b.); and in considering as untenable the ground of Lord C.'s decision, that he has detected Sir Anthony Hart in a blunder that would reflect discredit upon a tyro (p. 35, note i.).

Having said so much upon the manner and style of Mr. Stokes' performance—which, although they are no doubt objectionable, will nevertheless be found upon the whole very entertaining—it is time that we should give our opinion upon the more important question of the merits of the work regarded as a law treatise; and upon this we have no hesitation whatever in saying that the performance altogether is creditable to the author, and that the treatise will no doubt be very acceptable to the profession. It is evident that Mr. Stokes was sufficiently familiar with the subject before he commenced to write a book upon it, which gave him an important advantage over the majority of contemporary legal authors. His treatise is not a mere collection of the marginal notes of cases, with some attempt at classification, but is throughout characterised by intimate acquaintance with the subject. A mere statement of the heads of the chapters will give our readers the best notion of the manner in which he has gone about his work. Part I. Chapter I., treats of the subject matter of the retaining lien. Chapter II., of the person enforcing the retaining lien. Chapter III., of the person against whom the retaining lien may be enforced. Chapter IV., of the extent of the retaining lien. Chapter V., of the enforcement of the retaining lien. Chapter VI., of the time of enforcing the retaining lien. Chapter VII., of the defences which may be set up to the retaining lien. Part II. Chapter I., treats of the subject matter of the charging lien. Chapter II., of the person enforcing the charging lien. Chapter III., of the person against whom the charging lien may be enforced. Chapter IV., of the extent of the charging lien. Chapter V., of the enforcement of the charging lien. Chapter VI., of the time of enforcing the charging lien. Chapter VII., of the defences which may be set up to the charging lien. Part III. Chapter I., treats of the liens of town agents. Chapter II., of the liens of proctors, parliamentary agents, and other legal practitioners.

The work also contains an appendix of references to forms of orders, enquiries, and rules, in relation to the liens of attorneys and solicitors.

HILARY TERM EXAMINATION.

The examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys have appointed Tuesday, the 22nd, and Wednesday, the 23rd of January next, at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock each day.

Articles of clerkship and assignment, if any, with answers to the questions as to due service, according to the regulations approved by the judges, must be left with the secretary on or before Thursday, the 17th of January.

Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the term, the candidate may be examined conditionally; but the articles must be left within the first seven days of term, and answers up to that time. If part of the term has been served with a barrister, special pleader, or London agent, answers to the questions must be obtained from them, as to the time served with each respectively.

On the first day of examination papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in writing, classed under the several heads of—1. Preliminary. 2. Common and statute law, and practice of the courts. 3. Conveyancing.

On the second day further papers will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in—4. Equity, and practice of the courts. 5. Bankruptcy, and practice of the courts. 6. Criminal law, and proceedings before justices of the peace.

Each candidate is required to answer all the preliminary questions (No. 1); and also to answer in three of the other heads of inquiry—viz. common law, conveyancing, and equity. The examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in bankruptcy and in criminal law and proceedings before justices of the peace, in order that candidates who have given their attention to these subjects, may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

In case the testimonials were deposited in a former term, they should be re-entered, and the answers completed to the time appointed.

QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED BY THE CLERK.

Under the 4th section of the Attorneys Act, 1860.

1. How many years, before the execution of your articles of clerkship, were you a bonâ fide clerk to any, and what, attorney or solicitor?

2. State the nature of the business in which you were bonâ fide engaged during that period, and whether under the direction and superintendence of such attorney or solicitor?

3. State the names and places of business of the attorneys or solicitors with whom you have been so engaged, and the time of service to each respectively, before the date of your articles of clerkship.

4. What was your age at the commencement of the ten years' service prior to your articles?

QUESTIONS TO BE ANSWERED BY THE ATTORNEY.

1. How many years before the execution of the articles of clerkship of — was he a bonâ fide clerk to you?

2. During that period what was the position he occupied in your office, and what was the nature of the business transacted and performed by him under your direction and superintendence or of your partner?

3. Was he bonâ fide engaged in the transaction and performance of such matters of business as are usually transacted and performed by you as an attorney or solicitor?

4. Did he during the whole of that period faithfully, honestly, and diligently serve you as such clerk?

5. State your places of business during the time the said — was so engaged, and the length of time of his service to you before the date of his articles of clerkship, in the matters of business above referred to.

These questions are to be answered in the affirmative or negative, and any observations that may be thought necessary should be separately added.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 12, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The inauguration of the Hartley Institution at Southampton affords the Times an opportunity for having a fling at law and lawyers, with what fairness we hope the public may have some opportunity of judging. In the report which appeared of the proceedings upon that occasion, it is stated that Mr. Hartley's "splendid property having been subjected to the sifting process of law, it was by the time it once more got free from the Chancery Court, found to be sweated down from £100,000 to £40,000;" and the next morning we find in a leader of the same journal, that the sum of "£40,000 was paid as a moderate tribute to the presiding genius of the Court of Chancery; but as even for this price the Court of Chancery could not be got to make an end of the suit, £20,000 more was spent in compounding the quarrel." The writer in the Times, no doubt, was not unwilling to assume the accuracy of the figures supplied to him by the reporter in the country, who gives no authority whatever for the startling statement which he has made. We do not desire unnecessarily to say anything which can spoil the flavour, or lessen the effect of any of those spicy productions for which the Times is famous; but it is right in this case that we should express our serious doubts of the accuracy of the appalling figures of our great contemporary. Heavy and hard-fought as was the suit in question, it is extremely improbable that anything like half the amount was incurred by the proceedings in chancery. Of the round sum named by the Times, more than one quarter (£10,000) at the very least, must have been expended on legacy and probate duties. The gift being residuary, it was of course subject to all the expenses of administering the estate, which, as the property was very large, and there were annuities and other legacies, must have been very considerable; and, thus, although we have got no peculiar means of information it is easy to conceive how very different the actual cost of this formidable chancery suit must have been from the round estimate of it which we have mentioned. But it is said that, notwithstanding all the costs incurred, the Court of Chancery could not be got to make an end of the suit, but that £20,000 was expended in "compounding the quarrel." The fact was, that with the exception of the legacies and other annuities to which we have referred, the entire residue of this large property was bequeathed by the testator away from his heir-at-law and next of kin, and for a purpose which, until recently, was altogether illegal; and which even now many persons insist to be equally opposed to the policy of our law, and the principles of political economy. A very difficult question, moreover, arose upon the operation of the recent Act of Parliament, which alone could have the effect of rendering legal the large charitable bequest made by the testator. It was hardly to be expected then under such circumstances that those who were disinherited by him should not adopt every means in their power for defeating his object. Nor is it fair that the Court of Chancery should bear the blame of an act of the Legislature which, although it did not plainly meet the case of such a bequest as this, yet introduced considerable doubt into the law bearing upon the subject: neither is it reasonable to attack the Court of Chancery because in such a state of things the Corporation of Southampton deemed it advisable to effect a compromise with the heir of Mr. Hartley.

We hope that some person conversant with the actual cost incurred in this admittedly onerous litigation will enlighten the public as to the amount which was in fact caused by the proceedings in the Court of Chancery. We feel quite satisfied that whenever the truth is known it will be found that the Times has lent itself, for the sake of a popular cry, to a most monstrous and unfair piece of exaggeration.

Some complaints as to the manner in which judgments are drawn up in the Probate and Divorce Court have reached us. We are informed that the Registrar draws up and enters the decree of the Court without any notice to the solicitors on either side, and, therefore, without giving them an opportunity of seeing that the decree is right, not only in substance, but in form—the latter sometimes being as important as the former. From the general character of the business of the Probate and Divorce Courts it might be naturally supposed that the procedure of the Court of Chancery would have afforded the former Courts useful precedents in this respect. In Chancery, minutes of the decree are first drawn up by the Registrar, and are passed only after notice to, and in the presence of, the solicitors on both sides; and, if no objection is made, the decree is formally passed by the Registrar, after which it is "entered." But no decree in that Court can ever be entered without a full opportunity to all the parties in the cause of discussing its details and seeing that the decision of the judge is satisfactorily expressed. The advantages of this system are obvious, and we know of no reason why Sir C. Cresswell should eschew them. We have heard, indeed, of one or two instances in which very awkward results have followed from the present system, which gives to the parties no opportunity whatever of preventing any misconception on the part of the Registrar.

Our attention has also been called to the inconvenient practice of delivering reserved judgments at the close of the day, which the Judge Ordinary has adopted, notwithstanding the usage to the contrary which all the courts on both sides of Westminster Hall have uniformly observed. The delivery of a judgment is generally a work of short duration. It has, therefore, been always considered a convenient practice to deliver reserved judgments at the sitting of the Court, and not at its rising; as in the latter case the effect is to detain parties and perhaps their solicitors and counsel in court during the entire day, for what is generally disposed of in a few minutes.

Another singularity in managing the Divorce business is the taking of causes out of their turn. Not one of the cases heard since the first day of Michaelmas Term, 1860, was taken in the regular course of the paper. This is unquestionably a hardship upon litigants. Some cases which commenced in 1858 are still undisposed of; while in others which commenced in the end of 1859 decrees were pronounced in Michaelmas Term last.

Hilary Term commenced yesterday. The number of causes set down for hearing are as follows:—

Appeals	10
Master of the Rolls	121
V. C. Kindersley	56
V. C. Stuart	74
V. C. Wood	96

The Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, which will commence its sittings on the 18th inst., has nearly 200 causes set down for hearing.

The Probate Court will commence its sittings to-day, with 150 causes down for hearing.

The following statement represents the state of business in the common law courts:—Court of Queen's Bench, arrears 104, Common Pleas 53, Exchequer 65. In the Queen's Bench there are in the new trial paper one rule for judgment and 61 for argument, while in the special paper there are two for judgment and 29 for argument; in addition to these there are 11 enlarged rules. In the Common Pleas there are 10 enlarged rules and 21 new trials; one matter stands for the opinion of the Court, and 21 demurrers and special arguments are entered. In the Court of Exchequer there are two errors and appeals from the Court of Exchequer for judgment and eight for argument; in the peremptory paper there are five rules for discussion, and in the special paper there are eight rules for judgment and 13 for argument. Of new trial rules there are nine for judgment and 20 for argument.

Lord Brougham, in a characteristic reply to an invitation to attend the Boston "Convention" on the anniversary of the death of Captain Brown, states that the well-known aphorism, according to which no slave can live on English ground, has not, as is generally supposed, Lord Mansfield, but one of the Scotch judges, for its author. Lord Brougham does not mention to which of the Scotch judges he attributes the authorship of the memorable saying in question; and he is taken to task by a provincial newspaper, the Bury Post, for not knowing that it was first delivered by Lord Mansfield in 1772, in the "great case of the negro Somerset." The case referred to is Somerset v. Stewart, reported in Loft's Reports. In this case the master of a ship was required to show cause upon a habeas corpus for the seizure and detention of a negro who had been purchased by the defendant as a slave, and who having been brought to England by his master, was sent by him on board a vessel lying in the river, there to be detained in custody of the captain until the sailing of the ship. The arguments of Mr. Hargrave and Mr. Alleyne, on behalf of the negro, and of Mr. Dunning and Mr. Serjeant Davey on the other side, are admirable specimens of forensic logic, while in truth the decision of Lord Mansfield, although in favour of liberty and humanity, was not supported by a judgment at all equal to the occasion, it being not only very brief but very common place. The figure of speech that, "no slave can breathe the air of England," or that he is made free by touch of the English soil, turns up here and there in the argument of counsel; but nowhere is to be found in the judgment of Lord Mansfield. Mr. Hargrave more than once says that the air of England is too pure for slavery; but he attributes the authorship of the saying to some advocate of the cause of a Russian slave before the Star Chamber: Mr. Dunning, in reply, said, that "neither the air of England was too pure for a slave to breathe in, nor had the laws of England rejected servitude." Perhaps some of our readers will be able to refer us for the authorship of the saying in question still further back than the date of the case before the Star Chamber; or some of our Scotch friends will possibly "condescend to particulars" as to the name and period of the Scotch judge to whom, according to Lord Brougham, we are indebted for it.

The magistrates of Norfolk at the last quarter sessions for that county had a discussion upon the subject of Expenses on Criminal Prosecutions. They have added their testimony to the justice of the complaints made by the grand juries of York, Lancashire, and other counties, as to the insufficiency of the scale of Expenses of the Prosecution of Criminals which was some two or three years ago adopted by the Home Secretary. It appears that in addition to the complete disallowance of expenses incurred before the commitment of prisoners for trial, £8 per cent. had been struck off the last account presented by the county for repayment. The disallowance of expenses connected with the apprehension of prisoners is no doubt calculated in many cases to ensure the impunity of crime; and this feature, which has been particularly insisted on by the Norfolk magistrates, affords another reason, if one were wanting, for the entire revision of the present scale of charges connected with Criminal Prosecutions.

The important changes which have been made in the tests required of articled clerks in Ireland, and which some weeks ago (ante, p. 91) were detailed in this journal, are thus announced by the Irish correspondent in yesterday's Times:—

"A change of considerable importance to the profession of attorneys and solicitors in Ireland has recently been made with respect to the admission of apprentices. Hitherto no qualification was required beyond the payment of stipulated fees, but, in compliance with the recommendation of the Society of Attorneys and Solicitors, the Benchers resolved upon subjecting the candidates to strict tests of their general knowledge, and a regular examination of a comprehensive and severe character has been instituted."

Mr. Phinn, Q.C., has published a denial of the very general rumour which there was some weeks ago of his appointment to the Chief Justiceship of Madras. It is intimated that the appointment was offered to him, but declined.

TAXATION OF SUITORS—No. II.—SHOULD SUITORS BEAR ANY OF THE EXPENCE OF COURTS AND OFFICES OF JUSTICE?

We are glad to hear rumours that the whole subject of legal finance, which for nearly twenty years has excited so much interest among solicitors, and so often been the subject of petition to Parliament and memorial to legal authorities, is likely to be brought under the consideration of a Royal Commission. Lawyers though we are, we trust any such commission will rather be a commission of financiers and bankers than of lawyers; for surely those whose studies have been mainly conversant with Coke and with Littleton and their congeners, have found there little bearing on the questions of legal taxation and its incidence, its supervision, and its collection; and still less on the questions of banking departments of courts and the best system of bookkeeping; whether these departments should be fused, and how far profit can be best derived from the deposits; whether these departments should all employ the Bank of England as most courts do, or a private banker as the Queen's Bench does; the best method of drawing court orders upon the funds; and how far any other financial machinery of the State can be called in aid of our judicial system. Still, although we should as soon think of employing a judge as architect for the new concentrated courts of justice, as of relying on legal wisdom to determine these questions; yet, on the other hand, as the judge is the first who should be consulted on the conveniences required, so is the profession the first to be consulted on the financial needs and interests of the suitors. Therefore it is that we propose in some detail to discuss the subjects stated in a recent article, and now again indicated.

As to the question whether the suitor should be taxed at all, our readers are aware that many of those who consider themselves the especial disciples of Jeremy Bentham, hold, that every court and office of justice should be maintained by the State, the suitors paying their own expenses and that of their witnesses. The late and the present Master of the Rolls seem to hold these views (see Report on Fees, 1848, and on Concentration of Courts, 1860). It is impossible, however, we think, to contend for so wide a rule, unless, indeed, the subjects and area to which the legal State machinery is now applied are materially narrowed; and are confined to those matters which are vital to the very existence of property.

To try to elicit the true principles which should govern legal taxation, let us take the more extreme cases, and begin with criminal law. Crime is destructive of the ultimate bases and objects of society—individual property and individual freedom; and therefore not only should all the criminal establishments be maintained by the State; or else (and this is an important question) by the locality where the crime is committed (as in the old case of the hundred being made liable to a civil action for damage by rioters)—but the State should also bear every expense which might deter either prosecutor or witness from aiding in the conviction of the particular crime, and therefore in the suppression of all crime. The shamefully insufficient allowance for expenses of prosecutions—the shabby treatment of coroners by counties, all often commented on in this Journal, come under this head of consideration. It will be seen, therefore, that for the criminal establishment we have got to a rule larger than that attributed (though incorrectly) to the great jurist; for here the witness must be paid by the State; and this shows that the proportion of State contribution should vary with the extent of the State's interest in the question under determination. At the same time inducements to make false charges (such as rewards to individual policemen on conviction) must be avoided. The abstract and scientific rule, if one be discoverable, will be found, further, to be one which must in application be from time to time modified to meet the general changes of education and morals. In a more rude state of society, the allowance of half the penalty to an informer; and the permission to bring qui tam actions were probably, on the balance of considerations right.

Let us next go to the other pole of the legal sphere, and take the case, say, of the office for registration of deeds in Middlesex. Nothing would be more unjust than to throw the burthen of such an establishment on the country at large,—or on the county even,—or on other than the particular owners of land who benefit by the security (if such it be) that registration affords.

Take next the Court of Probate, that is to say, the Will register office. Clearly the estate of the will makers (and by way of ad valorem too) ought to pay the expense of this establishment, except so far as there may be court hearings, to determine the law on questions of will or no will or the like. But why not that expense also? Because all the kingdom is interested in that decision. The decision is in effect an Act of Parliament—a law for the whole State for the future. On the one hand the cost of judge and officers, if not more, should be paid in respect of everything which would be reportable for the law books—(with perhaps some exceptions of nicety and interest referred to below)—on the other hand, the expense of everything purely administrative, e.g., the management of funds and trusts, all accountant-general's work for instance; all ascertainment of testator's debts and closing the accounts of his estate except judicial decisions on them; should, we conceive, be clearly charged on the funds under administration. Courts have perpetually to employ auctioneers in the course of such work. The State might as well be asked to maintain them. Formerly Chancery auctions were exempt from the auction duty then in force. We have known more than the whole cost of a suit saved by this exemption. The State thus, as it were, subsidized the Court for that particular class of business it should least have paid for. But this is all rightly at an end now.

Let us now consider the case of Bankruptcy. Creditors have found it to their interest and profit to sell on credit. The debtor fails. Surely the State ought not to pay for realizing and dividing the assets! Probably it also follows (though it is beside our present purpose to consider) that the State has no right to impose official assignees upon the creditors to do their work. On the other hand, when the bankrupt has committed frauds, the State should pay for his prosecution; and we think the whole of such prosecution should be entirely removed from the Bankruptcy Administration Court. So little is a bankruptcy jurisdiction one vital to society and property, that although the constitution of the United States allows the enactment of bankruptcy laws, none such exist—where they have existed they are repealed. The effect is to make debts in the States, to a larger extent than here, debts of honour; and authorities have considered that trade faith is all the better kept there without a bankruptcy law.

Let us come next to such matters as the Common Law Courts deal with. So far as all actions bearing on title—trespass—tort, &c., go, the functions of Courts are vital. As to contracts it is certainly not wholly so. An important political party in America have laid it down as what is there called part of their platform, that not only shall not the State maintain or subsidize courts for the recovery of debts arising from dealings on credit; but that no such court should be allowed to exist. Their arguments are to the effect that the creditor, for his own advantage and higher profits, chooses to enter into such contracts; that such contracts are of doubtful advantage; if not, when at long dates, mischievous to the State, and that the State is not interested in keeping up law screws or other instruments of legal compulsion for the benefit of the creditor; that there are fraudulent creditors quite as often as fraudulent debtors; and that creditors have been far too powerful and too much considered in the making of laws. Wild as such notions at first sight appear to our habits of thinking, there is a fragment of serious truth involved in them, to which at present we must do no more than allude, as one we think much overlooked in this country, especially in the county court system. That system has created an immense amount of dealing and credit of a nature almost unknown in England before; and we think, in the main, very deleterious. It is curious to see, that while in this country the tendency of legislation is continually to enlarge the area of judicial or quasi-judicial interference; in America, the tendency is the other way. Each country at its Revolution had nearly the same laws. Each has since been diverging in an opposite direction. The operative causes in each of those divergencies deserve the most careful study of the practical jurist.

The correct rule on the question at the head of this article, on the whole, seems to us to be that the cost of our whole judicial establishment should be borne by the public, except so far as its functions are administrative; and, perhaps, except so far as it is employed to enforce voluntary contracts on credit; at any rate when entered into for long dates.

A LAW UNIVERSITY.

The tendency of systems of education appears to be subject to the same general laws of reaction as those which govern other social institutions. In the middle ages, when the monks were the sole schoolmasters of England, young men were supposed to be instructed in the complete curriculum of what were then called the seven liberal arts—grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. After a time, however, logic or dialectics was imagined to comprise the whole domain of human wisdom, and to this great study every other was deemed to be subsidiary. In like manner, upon the first institution of universities, not only such ordinary branches of learning as from time to time should be comprehended under the general term of “arts,” but also all other “faculties” were included in the programme of those now venerable institutions. But the time has long gone by when people look to Oxford or Cambridge for a supply either of music masters, or medical doctors; and for some time the notion has been common that a large percentage of those who have acquired the highest degrees in the faculty of law, are not of necessity even passable lawyers. To be sure, the old universities continue to have doctors of music who never composed an opera or even a ballad, and doctors of law who never opened a text book or a volume of reports; and so the original notion of universality in teaching is theoretically maintained. It is stated, however, that the University of Oxford is willing to abate a little of its pretensions as to the teaching of law, with a view to making itself somewhat more practically useful. The Regius professorship of Civil Law, which derives its title and endowment from a grant of Henry VIII., and the Viner professorship founded at a later period, are to be fused into one, with a view of enabling the university to procure the real and not the sham services of a competent lawyer. We believe it is not yet decided what are to be the precise duties of the new professor. We assume, however, from the nature of the change, that it is not the intention of the university to popularise jurisprudence, or to reduce it from the position of an independent "faculty" to be one of the occasional subjects of study in the undergraduate course. The design is probably to enable both graduates and undergraduates to acquire some general notion of the principles of law before they leave the university. In this, however, success to any extent can hardly be expected. Young men go to the university to complete their general education; but the time is gone by when any except those who intend to become clergymen or schoolmasters will go there for the purpose of professional training. Except in these two cases it is full time, therefore, for Oxford and Cambridge to relinquish their pretensions to train men for the various professions, and especially for the profession of the law. Not that we mean for a moment to depreciate in the least the value of the undergraduate course at these universities. What we say is, that having given a youth a liberal education, they had better not also affect the responsibility of fitting him for discharging the special duties of a profession—especially of such a profession as that of the law. If this be so it would be more decent for them to relinquish the pretensions and the profits which are implied in the granting of University degrees in the faculty of law; and as many people will have such degrees, one source of profit would thus be secured for a real Law University, whenever it may be established in this country.

The law officers of the Crown are at present, engaged in preparing their plans for a new Palace of Justice. The time is not inopportune, therefore, for urging upon their attention the foundation of a great national law school, which would in reality be able to accomplish what Oxford and Cambridge do not pretend even by a make-believe to undertake. Such an institution should provide for the instruction in the principles of law, not only of those who are intended for its practice, but also of those numerous classes of persons for whom, although they are beyond the pale of professional lawyers, more or less knowledge of law is indispensable. The recent exhibition of justices' justice at Cirencester, although luckily brought under the notice of the general public by the spirited conduct of Mr. Boodle, is unfortunately not a rare instance of the injustice done to the poorer classes through the administration of the law by persons who are ignorant of its first principles; and even if some slight smattering of law were attainable at Oxford or Cambridge, it is not likely that it would do much to remedy this evil. It would, therefore, be highly desirable that country gentlemen who are intended for the magistracy should have some opportunity of acquiring the necessary training in a university suitable for that purpose. Another class of persons for whom such training is also required, are our foreign consuls. In the discussion which lately took place between Mr. Lindsay and the New York Chamber of Commerce, it appeared to be generally admitted that it was necessary to confer upon consular agents a limited jurisdiction for the trial of certain offences, whether committed by subjects of their own, or even of a foreign country. It is not difficult, however, to conceive what serious international questions might arise, in the event of such power being given to persons unacquainted with the principles of jurisprudence; and yet there are at present no suitable means in this country for imparting a legal education to persons intended for the consular service.

It has been proposed that a university shall be established which would provide for the education in law not only of our ambassadors, consuls, and justices, but also to some extent—so far as general principles are concerned—of barristers and solicitors; leaving the special training of the two latter classes of persons as it is now provided for by the Inns of Court and the Law Institution. The task would present apparently but little difficulty if all the scattered agencies which at present exist were brought into a common centre; and the first step towards this desirable object would be the relinquishment on the part of the universities of their present unjustifiable and inordinate pretensions to supply the want which they are obviously unable to meet. The medical profession has long successfully asserted its claims to independent action in this respect; and has its centres of education in the metropolis—where they ought to be. We claim no more on behalf of the profession of the law; and we have little doubt that the time is not far distant when there shall be in London a law university adequate to meet the requirements not only of the profession, but of the entire country.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA—REPORT OF THE REGISTRAR-GENERAL, 1860.

Our readers may remember that in February, 1859, Sir Hugh Cairns, during his tenure of office, presented to Parliament two Bills relating to title, which were intended to effect sweeping changes in the existing laws of real property. One of these Bills proposed to introduce a system of indefeasible Parliamentary titles, such as can be obtained at present in Ireland under the Landed Estates Court Act; the other Bill was intended to establish a system of registry for those titles only in respect of which a declaration under the previous Bill, if constituted law, had been obtained. Land once on the register should always, according to this Bill, continue there. No trusts were to appear on the register. Trustees, however, when registered, were to be deemed tenants in common, so that no less than the original number of trustees could exercise a power of disposition over the land. The cestuique trusts were intended to be further secured by the privilege (accorded to them by the bill) of lodging caveats or injunctions against the trustees, as also by a direction in the Bill that judges should direct inhibitions or caveats of a somewhat permanent character on behalf of cestuique trusts, who might require this protection. The Act was intended as a compromise between the claims of trade in land, and of the interests usually protected by the tying up of land by family settlements. At present the chief security for trusts is the doctrine of notice; for this, inhibitions—the indices of a judicial recognition of dormant trusts—appear to us to have been an unnecessary and inadequate substitute. Sir Hugh Cairns' Bill was, generally, somewhat severely treated both for its principle and machinery. The copious obliterations and amendments which its clauses underwent prior to its final rejection would, certainly, seem to indicate that the practical merits of the Bill were not greatly underrated. But, as to the principles embodied in Sir Hugh's Bills, they had, doubtless, been for many years the watchwords of a considerable number of law reformers. The principles had been moreover discussed and favourably considered by numerous royal commissions, and verified in fact by the ten years' siege which the Incumbered Estates Court Act had laid to feudal monopoly in the sister island. These principles will, doubtless, re-appear on the legislative arena in some less vulnerable form than the vapour of Parliamentary discussions has hitherto permitted them to present. To the advocate of such changes, we earnestly recommend the consideration of the Real Property Act, passed by the Legislative Council for South Australia, to which the royal assent was given on 17th October, 1860.

The first Australian Act of this nature was passed by the Legislative Council in 1858. Certain casus omisi were provided for by an enactment of the subsequent year; and now the experience of two years is embodied in the Act of 1860, which repeals and consolidates both the former Acts, besides adding some amendments of its own. The report of Mr. Torrens, the Registrar-General, condenses the substance of these Acts, and explains their operation with a practical minuteness (not wanting in perfect comprehension of principle), which no black-letter lawyer, unpractised in dealings with stock and ship registries could perhaps exhibit in a similar performance. We may thus contemplate Mr. Torrens as Lord Macaulay's traveller, fresh from the antipodes, sketching the time-honoured fabric of our law with a view to assisting us in its repair.

The report of the Registrar-General explains both the principles and the machinery of the Act in most ample detail. The report commences by attributing the complications of our law of real property to the dependent or derivative character of titles—in other words, to the absence of a parliamentary title, except such as is given by the Statute of Limitations—to the absence, in short, of a terminus, a ne plus ultra to the objections of a scrutinizing purchaser. This objection does not apply to the Irish law of real property, which, in this respect, is identical with the law of South Australia. In order to abolish the dependent character of titles, and to prevent all occasion for investigating the retrospective history of property the Act, the subject-matter of the report and of these observations, has substituted "registration of titles" for "transfer by deeds." Instead of distinct systems of parliamentary titles and registration as in Ireland, the Australian law accomplishes both objects by the single process of registration.

In order to cut off the derivative character of titles, the "indefeasibility of title" acquired by registration is, the report states, "a first principle." It is the sum and substance of the system. This title so acquired is a bar to all prior claims. A rightful owner, deprived of land by the registration of the title of an unlawful possessor, will either recover the money value of the land from the person benefited by the registration, or will be indemnified out of the assurance fund hereinafter explained; but the registration has intercepted and cut off his title to the land itself. Registration, in short, gives an indefeasible parliamentary title, and extinguishes all prior claims of every kind. The entry in the register is the assurance or transfer; the deeds inter partes merely operate as authorities for the performance of the act of record. Upon every fresh transfer, or transmission of the fee, the new proprietor holds directly of the Crown. A new terminus is thus created. The original transfer annihilated all previous complications of title; the new one extinguishes any complications that may have since arisen. The land is thus kept always ready for the market. Lands alienated in fee from the Crown after 1st July, 1858, come ipso facto under the operation of the Act. Other lands may be brought under its operation, upon the application of the owner in fee, or of a tenant for life in possession. In cases of a tenancy in common, all the tenants in common must join in making the application. If the land be in mortgage both mortgagor and mortgagee must concur, unless the mortgagee have a power of sale, in which case the application of the mortgagee alone is sufficient. The application has to state the nature of every estate or interest held in the land whether by the owner or others, and also to describe the boundaries, and give a diagram of the land; it specifies its value, and whether it be mortgaged, leased, tenanted, &c., and whether it be subject to easements, or any other rights limiting the interest of the proprietor. He must, besides the title deeds, lodge also an abstract of title, if required. The application together with the deeds is then submitted to the solicitors appointed under the Act, who, after a search in the General Registry Office, make their report to the Board of Lands Titles Commissioners. The board consists of the Registrar-General, and two other commissioners. If the land, the subject of the application, has been granted by the Crown to the applicant since the 1st March, 1842—the period of the establishment of the first system of registry in the colony—and if no transaction affecting the land appears on record, then the land is immediately brought under the operation of the Act. In other cases advertisements are exhibited in the courts, and published in the local papers, as also in the South Australian and in the London Gazettes; and the board considers the decision it should pronounce, which must be given within a period not less than two months, nor more than three years. Notices are issued likewise to the tenants, and to previous owners. Caveats with abstracts of the title of the caveator will suspend the proceedings, as also the registration of every instrument affecting the land to which the caveat applies, until an adjudication shall have been pronounced upon the caveat. If no caveat be lodged within the time limited by the board, a certificate of title is issued to the applicant in exchange for the title deeds, which are delivered up. The deeds are then stamped as cancelled, and, together with the application, the diagram and the solicitor's report, which is endorsed with the minute of the board, are deposited in a bag marked with the name of the applicant, the date of the application, its number, and the volume and folio of the register-book in which the original of the certificate of title is preserved. The preservation of these deeds appears to us cumbrous and unnecessary, and calculated to foster the prejudice that no system of registration can be devised for a long-established community that would not break down under its own weight.

Land so brought upon the register is subject only to such incumbrances, estates, interests, liens, &c., as are notified by memorial on the certificate of title. There is thus but one title deed, an original, constituting a folio of the register, and a counterpart delivered to the proprietor. Deeds of grant or transfer in fee are registered, or, as we should say, enrolled, at their full length, which consists of only a half dozen lines, while incumbrances are registered by a short memorial upon the deeds relating to the fee. The register books are thus composed of the deeds relating to the fee with their indorsements, bound together in volumes. These original sheets or certificates, and the counterparts in the hands of the proprietors, are, as it were, mutual tallies, upon which all incumbrances are to be afterwards noted—integer representatives of the fee of the land, the endorsements upon which are so many negative quantities to be subtracted from the value of the interest of the proprietor. The indefeasibility of his title is beyond dispute, and the value of that interest can be computed at a glance. Nothing can be more simple or unambiguous. All claims not notified upon the "certificate of title" are ignored and incapable of being enforced, and virtually cease to exist. De non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio. The only exceptions to this rule are cases of fraud, rights of way or easements, wrong description of boundaries, and prior grants from the crown, or prior certificates of title, of the same land. Land, for which a certificate of title has been obtained through fraud, can be recovered in ejectment, or its value can be recovered in an action by the rightful owner, unless it shall have been aliened to a purchaser without notice of the fraud. A rightful owner, deprived of his land by an error or omission in the register, or by the issue of a certificate of title to another person in error without fraud, can recover the value of his land from the person benefited by the issue of the certificate, or by the omission in the register. If the rightful owner, dispossessed in any of these modes, fail to recover the land or its value from the parties liable, as we have just stated, then he is indemnified for his loss out of the assurance fund. This is a fund created by a per-centage of a halfpenny in the pound levied upon all lands bought or transmitted under the operation of the Act.

The deeds submitted upon application for a certificate of title, if relating to other property, are only cancelled as to the land the subject of the application, and, thus partially cancelled, are returned to the proprietor. If the tenant for life of land obtain a certificate, or surrender his estate for life to the next in remainder, the remainderman may then also obtain a certificate for his remainder, upon payment of like fees as the tenant for life, except the $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per centage for the Assurance Fund. A remainderman, when registered as such, must deal with the estate afterwards only in the mode prescribed by the Act. Persons registered as joint proprietors are to be deemed joint tenants; tenants in common must obtain separate certificates. The certificate of title is not open to any objection on the ground of want of notice of the application for a certificate having been made by the certificated proprietor, nor on the allegation of any error, or informality in the application; but it is conclusive evidence of the right of the certificated proprietor, as also of the incumbrancers, and of those only whose incumbrances are noted on the certificate, as we have before described; the order of the priorities of the several incumbrancers being conclusively determined by their order upon the certificate. Instruments registered by memorial are to be deemed part of the register-book. The marking of a mortgage, with the number of the volume and folio of the certificate upon which it is endorsed in the register, as it is also on the duplicate certificate in the hands of the proprietor, renders the mortgage conclusive evidence of its contents, just as the certificate of title is conclusive evidence of its own integrity. The indefeasible character of the latter is impressed on its accessory, the mortgage. Lands brought under the Act can afterwards be dealt with only in the manner and according to the forms prescribed by the Act. Easements and incorporeal rights, except annuities and grants of rent-charge, if charged upon land brought under this Act, and created for the purpose of being enjoyed with other lands likewise brought under this Act, must be registered to affect the land so charged.

Thus far the Act deals with lands in the hands of proprietors not intending to settle them. The principle of the Act in this behalf is simple its machinery; free from cumbrousness, yet perfectly complete and efficacious. A registered index merely referring to lands and their owners and incumbrances, to which, as also to its counterpart, the force of a parliamentary title-deed is given by law, is really the whole essence of the system.

If an index can be constituted a mode of conveyancing, we can perceive no objection either to the process or the name. That it can be thus successfully applied in a new country is demonstrated as a fact by the foregoing narrative. We now come to the portion of the Act which relates to transfers, transmissions, &c., of land brought under the operation of the Act. A transfer is effected by the vendor signing a memorandum according to a certain short form, given in a schedule to the Act, referring to the certificate of title and specifying the quantity of interest intended to be transferred. When this memorandum is presented to the registrar, he cancels the existing certificate of title, and issues a fresh one to the purchaser; if only part of the land be assigned, the certificate is only cancelled as to that part. Leases of lands brought under the operation of this Act must, when they exceed a term of three years, be according to the form given in the schedule to the Act, and must also be registered. A surrender is effected by the word "surrendered" being endorsed on the lease or counterpart, and recorded in the register. Forms of mortgages and incumbrances are likewise given, and are directed to take priority respectively according to the dates of their registration, notwithstanding that the incumbrancer who registers is effected either with express, implied, or constructive notice of prior incumbrances. This last provision seems superfluous, since no incumbrance can be created except by registration. Contracts, indeed, may be entered into without registration, so as to be enforceable in equity against the owner; but not, even according to the previous provisions of the statute, against a subsequent registered incumbrancer. It would be an improvement in the wording, if not in the force, of the Act, were the section relating to grants of certificate and transfer worded precisely as is the provision we have just referred to (sec. 51) concerning mortgages and incumbrances. Fraud is the only species of wrong that vitiates the two former classes of assurances. But fraud, in its legal acceptance, is more extensive than notice. Where there is notice, there is at least constructive fraud; but an assurance may be vitiated by fraud practised by the vendor, although the purchaser have no notice of prior existing incumbrances. The terms notice and fraud are sometimes used as synonymous, whereas they differ widely in the legal liabilities which they affix upon the parties affected.

A mortgagee has powers of sale, distress, entry, ejectment, or foreclosure, but not the legal estate; the land being in law what it is in England in equity—a security for a loan. On extinguishment or surrender of a mortgage, the owner of the land may have a fresh certificate of title issued to him, thus obliterating all record of prior transactions. If the mortgagee be absent from the colony, the mortgage-money may be paid to the Registrar-General. The assignee of a mortgage or annuity has the legal interest in the claim, and may sue for the chose in action in his own name. This inversion of our rule which gives to an assignee of a mortgage the legal estate in the land, but only an equitable right to the sum so secured, suggests a wholesome amelioration for our adoption in this branch of law.

Mr. Torrens condemns the system of equitable mortgage by deposit of title deeds, an expedient unnecessary under the Australian system. However, as there is but one title deed, money can consequently be raised more easily on its deposit, in proportion to the security the possession of a deed so circumstanced confers. A covenant for further assurance is implied in every instrument. In mortgages, covenants to pay and to keep in repair are implied on the part of the mortgagor. Certain words, such as "insure," "repair," &c., operate according to a provision to that effect in the Act, as effectually for creating covenants, as if these latter were set out at full length. This is just as if the marginal abridgments of our precedent, were to be interpreted as expressing the substance of the passages indicated by them. This system, although apparently visionary, appears to us to deserve consideration. Every power and covenant implied by force of the Act may be waived by express agreement.

Upon entry in the register of a memorial of the instrument called "nomination of trustees," the estate vests in the parties named as trustees. They then have absolute powers of disposition of the land, and the purchaser is in no case bound to see to the application of the purchase-money. The words, "no survivorship," if inserted, will prevent any number of trustees, less than the original number, from dealing with the estate. But, it would seem that in all other cases the cestuique trust have no security whatever; while even in this case the surviving trustees may nominate their co-trustees—a power which affords every facility for collusion. The cestuique trust may bring an action of ejectment in his own name, on indemnifying the trustee. The Act, we think, would have been still more commendable in this respect, if it had rendered every species of action open to the cestuique trust. The cestuique trust may enter a caveat upon the intended disposition of the land by the trustee. But such a privilege appears to be no security whatever for those cestuique trusts who may be infants in fact as well as in law, and who stand most in need of the protection afforded by our law through its doctrine of notice. The transmission of property upon the death, bankruptcy, or insolvency, of the registered proprietor is recorded on the register, upon production of a declaration to that effect made by the claimant before the Registrar-General or others appointed by the Act. An heir, &c., may obtain a new certificate in his own name. The 104th section of the Act abrogates the doctrines of actual and constructive notice, with a saving to creditors of their rights under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. According to the computation of the Registrar-General, the Act effects a saving of 90 per cent. in transfers, besides precluding the contingencies of litigation founded upon secret deeds, thereby as he insists, adding to the value of the land, whether it be intended for sale, mortgage, or for farming improvements. The cost of a declaration of title under Sir Hugh Cairns' Bill would be, as computed by Mr. Torrens, from £150 to £200, and the time occupied, from eighteen months to two years; while the holder of the declaration could be not only ejected from the land for fraud, but also deprived of the value of the capital sunk by him in improvements. This latter incident of ejectment the Australian Act negatives; while a rightful owner, on the other hand, if another holder of a declaration of title have sold the land to a bonâ fide purchaser without notice, will be indemnified to the full value of his loss out of the assurance fund, a provision for such cases not recognised by the Bill of Sir Hugh Cairns. Certainly, nothing can be more complete in its many yet simple details than the principles and machinery of this Act, which reflects the very highest credit upon the practical genius of Mr. Torrens, its author. We must never forget, however, the simplicity of his task, compared with any analogous undertaking in this country.

THE CANADA EXTRADITION CASE.—It is stated that the committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have taken the requisite steps to obtain, by a writ of habeas corpus, the transference of the case to the Court of Queen's Bench in England. The proceeding is a very unusual one, but there exists a precedent for it, in the case of the Queen v. Lees, which was decided in favour of the defendant. Up to that period it was the almost unanimous opinion of the English bar that a writ of habeas corpus could not be issued to a colony.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

V.

OF THE EVIDENCE NECESSARY TO ESTABLISH A DOMICIL.

In another portion of this Treatise I have touched cursorily upon the subject of the evidence necessary to establish a domicile, which I shall now proceed to consider in detail. The evidence requisite to be brought forward upon a question of domicile embraces almost every species that can possibly be obtained—direct, indirect, and circumstantial. Direct evidence of facts relating to the birth, parentage, movements, and occupation of the individual whose domicile is in question; indirect, with reference to his intentions and views during such periods; and circumstantial, as regards any events connected with either of the other branches, and which may have any bearing upon them. Thus a man's birth, movements, and occupation, are facts of which, generally speaking, direct evidence may be obtained; whilst communications had with him or made from him to others, and acts done by him may be matters leading to inferences only, and not of themselves sufficient to constitute significant facts, although not without their use and force as connected with facts; habits also may stand on this footing, whilst a variety of circumstances, not, perhaps, coming under either the head of evidence direct or indirect, may still supply a wanting link in the chain, to support "a probable presumption," and are chiefly of consequence where the balance is very nicely poised. Property possessed by the party and its nature would come within this latter class, and the more solid its character the more it would in all probability be of value. Thus the possession of real estate or appendants to realty would be of weightier significance than the mere possession of personal chattels or money, or securities for money, because, although the latter may be much more valuable per se than the former, yet it is not necessarily so coupled with an intention to use it in any particular locality, being capable of transmission with so much greater facility; whereas anything in the nature of realty or appendant thereto, as lands, houses, or furniture, are indicative of an intention at some period to reside, and are important therefore as indicia. Another class of indirect evidence which often weighs considerably in doubtful cases, belongs to the expressions made use of by the person whose domicile is to be determined, and more especially in the exercise of any dispositional powers, although a correspondence is often of the last consequence as furnishing the means of arriving at a conclusion otherwise unattainable. As I have elsewhere said, it being impossible to see the mind of the party whose intention we wish to collect, it must be got at, and can only be got at, by the consideration of, perhaps, a large mass of evidence, consisting of a variety of component parts, not one of which alone would be enough to furnish a deduction still arrived at with very little moral doubt upon the whole. Thus the retention of a connection with a native country, during a long residence in a foreign one, has been thought to be a very significant circumstance; and it is more than doubtful whether, if the breaking off of such connection would be followed by a loss more than capable of balancing the interest attached to the foreign residence, a domicile that would otherwise be absolutely acquired by length of time and other necessary attendant circumstances in such foreign country would be so regarded by our law. Upon this branch the evidence must be distinct not only as to the connection itself, but as to the effect which such connection has upon the movements and rights of the party, which occurs chiefly where it is of a Government nature, such as half-pay, pensions, &c., which I shall have occasion to consider in another place. Direct evidence is generally easy of attainment; as, for instance, birth, death, acquirement of property and pursuit of occupation are things notorious, as being necessarily connected with the affairs of other people; whereas intention and personal acts refer only or chiefly to the individual immediately concerned; and it must always be borne in mind that direct evidence standing by itself is of value only as so standing; for it is capable of being rebutted by circumstances, as much as of being confirmed. To illustrate this, suppose the case of a person having two residences in every respect similar in two different countries, the one his birth-place, the other not, and there not being one tittle of direct evidence besides such facts; is it not manifest that attendant circumstances would be capable of very much governing the opinion of a court of law or equity in such a case, either to rebut or confirm a contention for one or the other being the domicile? Assuredly they would, for it requires very little experience to show how little we can judge from mere outward appearances, although no doubt it generally happens that circumstances are capable of leading to a correct and certain decision. Partaking of both kinds of evidence, the habits of the party are oftentimes very significant; but these, of course, are only so taken in connection with facts as that which may be conclusive of a particular intention in the habits of one person may not be so in those of another. It is not necessary to look very deeply into the subject to see this. There are not wanting instances where persons having gained wealth in the morning of their lives, have thenceforth (being without incumbrance, or if not, of a vagrant turn), moved from place to place, and from country to country, doing acts and expressing intentions in each amply sufficient, without more, to give them a domicile in each; and yet of course, such habit being known, would render any evidence with respect to them of a very different character than in an ordinary case, and hence the evidence direct depends very much upon the indirect and circumstantial. As it is one of the governing principles in this branch of the law that there must be an abandonment before there can be an acquirement, it follows, that the residence in both cases must be very distinct; and the fact of property or affairs left undisposed of or unsettled, is of importance in doubtful cases, although even here such a fact is capable of being explained, and it may be shown that a conversion or transmission would have taken place and was intended, had it not been for such and such things, &c.; and these attendant circumstances will determine its weight, and therefore the unsold or unsettled state of property or affairs in a foreign country where a domicile has been abandoned, will not be sufficient of itself to re-vest it; but the evidence as to the acquirement of another will, of course, very much affect the question of abandonment. Evidence of intention is only material where the circumstances attending the residence leave the matter in some degree of doubt; for if there be a sufficient case to show the fact the intention may almost be presumed, or at all events is almost inseparable from it.

Before concluding this part of the subject, I will refer to a case, illustrative of the views taken by the courts of justice in America, of the evidence necessary to show the abandonment or acquirement of domicile. A somewhat recent case of Cole v. The Inhabitants of Cheshire, was determined in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and is reported in 1 Gray (Amer. Rep.) 441. In that case the evidence of domicile was only incidentally considered; but the observations of Judge Thomas are so much to the point that I shall quote them as far as is necessary, without apology. "It was not difficult," he said, "to prove that a party came to a particular place before a particular time, and brought luggage, and made a contract for board and lodging; but the effects of these acts depended upon the intent and purpose with which they were done. If the intent and purpose was to do work on a particular farm, during the summer and autumn, and return to his family residence and home the ensuing winter, the facts proved would avail the party nothing" (speaking of the party wishing to prove a newly acquired domicile). "Qualified by such intent and purpose, they were perfectly consistent with the intention of retaining his domicile in Cheshire (his family residence), and would not only fail to show a change of domicile, but they would exclude the conclusion. The plaintiff must prove that he left Cheshire with the intent of abandoning his old domicile and of acquiring a new one; the intent was manifested by what he did, and by what he said, when doing was sometimes rendered as significant by what he omitted to do or say. In the negotiation (for his board and lodging), he stated that his purpose was not to live with his father after his time was out, and this negotiation with the declaration of purpose and intent, which not so much accompanied as made part of it, was a fact competent to be proved. Whether the negotiation was successful, whether it ripened into a contract or not, might affect the weight, but not the competency, of the evidence; such declarations were within the strictest rule, proof of the res gesta qualifying to give a character to the principal thing done. The sum of the whole matter simply was, that to prove his intent to leave his old domicile, the party was permitted to show that he had been in negotiation for a new one, with the avowed purpose of abandoning the old. It was open to the defendants to show that it was collusive and a sham; but if real and in good faith, that furnished the kind of evidence of which the case was in its nature susceptible; and which, uncontrolled, was satisfactory. It was competent to the plaintiff with a view to show that the purpose he had formed of abandoning his domicile in Cheshire, had been carried into effect, to prove that his domicile still continued in the other place (to which he had removed), and to exclude any inference that he had gone there for a temporary object, and with the intent to return after the object had been attained. To this end he must show that he held an office in his new domicile, or had engaged in any pursuit or calling indicating the design and purpose of making it a place of permanent residence." It is unnecessary to enter into the details of this case, the object of the plaintiff, however, was, to escape being taxed, according to the American law, by showing that he had acquired a new domicile, had been appointed to an office and taken up his abode in a lodging, where he had negotiated for his board and the keep of his horse for a certain sum, and it was held that he had acquired such domicile. It appears hence, and from other cases decided in the American courts, that both abandonment of old domiciles and acquirement of new ones are matters of much easier accomplishment in America than in this country, or even in France; and this is somewhat surprising, considering the vagrant habits consequent upon the state of society in so large a continent, where the choice and accomplishment of change is so comparatively easy; but the general observations apply equally to the necessary evidence as the subject is viewed by our law.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings in Banco before the LORD CHIEF BARON, and Barons MARTIN, CHANNELL, and WILDE.)

Jan. 11.—Manning & Redpath v. Farquharson, Cox, & Co., Garnishees.—In this case a rule was moved for, calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, to stay proceedings taken by the plaintiffs in the Lord Mayor's Court. The principal point in the case was that of jurisdiction. The plaintiffs Manning & Redpath were army tailors in Bond-street, and Mr. Farquharson, the defendant, had in 1858 obtained a commission in the line, as Ensign in the 65th Regiment, and Messrs. Cox & Greenwood became his army agents. Mr. Farquharson, however, left the army and proceeded to Italy to join the Garibaldians, and had there remained. On the 25th of Sept., 1860, the plaintiffs made an affidavit in the Lord Mayor's Court, claiming a debt of £536 12s. 6d. as due from Mr. Farquharson, and obtained a foreign attachment upon the monies in the hands of Messrs. Cox & Greenwood. The parties appeared to the suit, and on the part of Mr. Farquharson an application was made to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of prohibition, on the ground that no cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the city, when Mr. Justice Crompton considered that the Act of 20 & 21 Vict., cap. 137, altering and amending the proceedings in the Sheriff's Court and Lord Mayor's Court, gave that court jurisdiction, refused the prohibition. It was stated that owing to the fact of the case being heard on the last day of Michaelmas term, the attention of the learned judge had not been sufficiently drawn to the several sections of the Act; and it was now moved on the part of Messrs. Cox & Greenwood, as the garnishees, for the prohibition. The case was one of considerable importance, and had been before Mr. Baron Channell at chambers, who thought it was a case for the opinion of the Court. It was contended that here no cause of action occurred within the city: the plaintiffs Manning & Redpath lived in Bond-street, and Mr. Farquharson in Italy.

Mr. Baron MARTIN.—Cox and Co. are not in the city, are they? they live in Craig's-court.

Mr. M. Chambers (counsel for defendant).—I have an affidavit stating that Cox & Co. never lived in the city, nor had any office in the city; here the plaintiffs live out of the city. The cause of action arose out of the city. The defendant lives in Italy, and Messrs. Cox & Co. out of the city; and, therefore, I contend that the Lord Mayor's Court has no jurisdiction.

The LORD CHIEF BARON.—They had no more jurisdiction than they had in the moon.

Rule granted.

Buckmaster v. Same.—Mr. Chambers said this was precisely a similar application, the plaintiff was also an army tailor in Old Burlington-street.

Rule granted.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Jan. 7.—The sittings of the above court were resumed this morning, pursuant to adjournment. The Court was opened by the Right Hon. W. Cubitt, M.P., Lord Mayor of the city of London, Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., the Recorder, Alderman Sir J. Duke, Alderman Sir F. G. Moon, Alderman Sir R. W. Carden, and Alderman Mechi, Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton, and Mr. Under-Sheriff Gammon.

The calendar was light.

THE CASE OF ALL SOULS' COLLEGE, OXFORD.

The hearing of the appeal of three of the Fellows of All Souls' College, Oxford, to the Archbishop of Canterbury, as visitor of the college, against the construction put by the Warden and the majority of the Fellows upon that part of the ordinance of April, 1857, of the University Commissioners which relates to the qualification and the election of Fellows, was commenced on the 8th inst. at Lambeth Palace, before the Archbishop, assisted by two assessors, Lord Wensleydale and Dr. Travers Twiss, Q.C., Judge of the Consistory Court of London, and Regius professor of civil law. On the 17th of May, 1859, the appellants had forwarded a printed appeal to the Archbishop, concluding with the following prayer:—

"We therefore humbly request your Grace,

"1. To declare that every Fellow has a right to be present at all College meetings, whether held in the hall or elsewhere, and to rescind the resolution passed in the Common-room on April 27, 1859, on the ground that it annexes a condition to the exercise of this right.

"2. With regard to the arrangements for carrying out the election; to declare that no classical work shall be introduced into the examination; to rescind the by-laws passed on the 6th of April, 1858, and on the 27th of April, 1859, so far as they do not require the examiners to place the candidates in order of merit, and so far as they direct that the papers are to be burnt before the election; and to rescind the resolution passed in the Common-room on the 27th of April, 1859, on the further grounds that it is illegal for any College meetings for the discussion of the merits of candidates to be held otherwise than as formal meetings, or for votes to be given otherwise than openly, or for any obligation of secrecy as to college proceedings to be imposed on any Fellow against his will.

"3. To give an authoritative interpretation of the clause in the ordinance prescribing the grounds of election, determining between the conflicting opinions above exhibited.

"4. Lastly, to verify and complete the (necessarily very partial) statements contained in this petition, by making a visitation of the college, or other inquiry authorized by the 37th section of the ordinance, as to your Grace shall seem fit.

"ARTHUR GEORGE WATSON, B.C.L.

"WM. HY. FREEMANTLE, M.A.

"GODFREY LUSHINGTON, M.A."

The Warden and Fellows having put in an answer to the appeal, and the Archbishop considering it unnecessary to have the case argued by counsel, his Grace, on the 24th of October last, made his decision, whereby in substance he rejected the prayer of the appellants. An application was then made to the Court of Queen's Bench, on the part of the three Fellows, for a mandamus to the Archbishop to hear and determine the appeal. The rule was argued in May last. In the course of the argument it was intimated to the Court by the counsel for the Archbishop that he was perfectly willing to hear the case; and it was ultimately arranged, with the consent of all parties, that the case should be heard, and the rule for the mandamus was not made absolute.

The Archbishop, Lord Wensleydale, and Dr. Twiss, took their seats in the hall of the Palace at 11 o'clock.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Coleridge appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Bovill, Q.C., Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., Mr. Kenyon, and Mr. Granville Somerset, for the Warden and Fellows.

At the conclusion of the arguments the Archbishop stated he would reserve his judgment upon the case.

EQUITY.

PARTITION—FORM OF DECREE.

Clarke v. Clayton, 2 Giff. 333; Orger v. Sparke, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 180.

The first of the above-mentioned cases relates to an important change which has been made by one branch of the Court in the common form of partition decrees. The old and well-known form of decree provides for the issuing of a commission for the purpose of making the partition; and the commission directs the persons therein named to make a partition division and allotment of the hereditaments in the decree and pleadings mentioned. The Vice-Chancellor Stuart, however, in Clarke v. Clayton, said that "a commission in a partition suit is a very expensive, and generally a very unnecessary proceeding. Under its improved practice, the Court can give facilities for dividing the estate in a way much more satisfactory and less expensive than the old mode of proceeding by commission, even in cases where there is adverse litigation." His Honour's decree, therefore, was, after declaring that the hereditaments ought to be partitioned into equal third parts; Order the same, [usual order as to partition and allotment], and order that proposals for the said partition be laid before the judge for his approval, &c. The judge, or rather the chief clerk, is thus placed in the position in which commissioners are under the ordinary form of decree, except that the judge or chief clerk is not compelled "to go, enter upon, and walk over and survey the estate in question"—a proceeding which is no doubt frequently "very expensive, and generally very unnecessary"—except where the commissioners are the professional surveyors who would themselves be witnesses, and therefore, in that capacity, would have to do the same thing if they were not commissioners. But there appears to be no benefit in thus changing the proper functions of surveyors, and in delegating to them what properly belongs to some judicial functionary. If the commissioners are not to be surveyors, there is, perhaps, hardly any case in which the form of decree adopted in Vice-Chancellor Stuart's branch of the court would not be less expensive, and much more convenient, than the decree which has long been in common use, and which is still employed in other branches of the court. If it is desired, however, that the commissioners should be surveyors, then the answer is, that their knowledge can be brought to bear in a more effective and less objectionable manner as witnesses than as judges. According to the true theory of the usual decree, the commissioners are supposed to decide upon evidence; and it was for some time a question whether the evidence should not be returned together with the commission, which provides for taking the "depositions of witnesses," although such return is not usually made.

The second of the above-named cases decides that after a decree for partition each party has a right to have the decree executed, and therefore to call on everybody else to execute it; so that where there are three parties one cannot, under the direction to join in all proper conveyances, refuse to execute a conveyance to another, because the other and the third have not executed the conveyance to him.

Two or three comparatively recent decisions relating to partition suits may be conveniently noted here. In Johnstone v. Baber, 6 D. M. & G. 439, Lord Cranworth decided that the right to present to an advowson which was vested in trustees, and in which seven persons were beneficially interested equally as tenants in common, was vested in the seven; and they not agreeing among themselves as to the exercise of their right, that it should be determined by lot, and not according to seniority or by the majority, which of them should nominate the clerk to be presented by the trustees.

In Canning v. Canning, 2 Drew. 434, the Vice-Chancellor Kindersley held that, on a commission under a partition decree, as between co-heiresses, the eldest has no right of choice.

Before the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 36 conferred upon courts of equity exclusive jurisdiction in partitions—when courts of common law had power to make partition under the writ de partitione faciendâ—the usual mode in cases of advowsons was to direct alternate presentations. It was sometimes held that the choice went by seniority; and when Johnstone v. Baber was before the Master of the Rolls, his Honour decided that the existing vacancy was vested in the eldest of the tenants in common. The decision of Lord Cranworth, however, is for the present conclusive, that in such a case the choice must be by lot.

There is a common notion that commissioners after "separating and dividing" the estate, are bound to make their allotment by means of lots; which, however, is by no means the case. On the contrary, they are bound to exercise their discretion not only in making the partition and division, but also in making the allotment; and in exercising such discretion they are at liberty, and in some cases they are obliged, to take into account such considerations as eldership, occupation, &c.; and it is their duty in allotting to take into account the question as to which share will be most valuable to each party. So that, in fact, lots should not be resorted to except in such a case as that of an advowson, where no partition can be made, or where the commissioners find that there are no such special considerations as above mentioned to be regarded, and therefore that they have no occasion for the exercise of their discretion.

Another case may also be mentioned here, although not bearing directly upon any of the points already considered. At common law, in partitions under the writ de partitione faciendâ, the legal estate was vested by force of the partition. It is not so in equity; and, accordingly, the decree always directs the execution of mutual or other proper conveyances as in the above-named case of Ogier v. Sparke; but where infants were conveying parties, the Court was in the habit of postponing the direction for executing conveyances until the infant attained full age. But in Cole v. Sevell (17 Sim. 40), where the estate was vested as to one moiety in a trustee in trust for infants, Sir L.

Shadwell, V. C. E., held that a conveyance from a trustee under a decree of the Court in a partition suit, would give a good title to the party entitled to the other moiety; and that, therefore, it was not necessary to order the infants to convey when they came of age.

APPORTIONMENT—TENANT FOR LIFE AND REMAINDERMAN —RAILWAY DEBENTURES.

In re Rogers' Trust, V. C. K., 9 W. R. 64.

Mr. Swanston, in one of his learned and elaborate notes (Ex parte Smyth, 1 Swans. 337, n.), has written an historical account of the rules of law which first prevented apportionment of rents, annuities, and other periodical payments, and of the statutory enactments and decisions of courts of equity introducing exceptions to those rules. To the old rule of the common law, according to which no occupation-rent could be recovered on the death of a lessor tenant for life, in the interval between two periods for the payment of rent, Mr. Swanston gives the basis of the two following propositions—first, that an entire contract cannot be apportioned; and secondly, that under a lease, with a periodic reservation of rent, the contract for the payment of each portion is distinct and entire. To prevent the loss arising to the estates of tenants for life by the operation of this rule, the 11 Geo. 2, c. 19, was passed, by which (sec. 15) it is provided that where any tenant for life shall die during such interval, his executors may recover from the under-tenant the proportion of rent due. The 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, reciting the last-mentioned Act, and reciting that doubts had been entertained whether the provisions of that Act applied to every case in which the interests of tenants determined on the death of the person by whom such interests had been created, and on the death of any life or lives for which such person was entitled to the lands demised; the now stating Act in the first section proceeds to remedy that mischief, and by the second section it further enacts that all "rents, annuities, pensions, dividends, moduses, compositions, and all other payments of every description," made payable or coming due at fixed periods under any instrument, shall be apportioned in such manner that on the death of the person interested, he, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall be entitled to a proportion of such periodic payments.

The question in the above-named case related to the interest payable on railway debentures, and was not affected by either of the statutes to which reference has been made. A testator possessed of some railway debentures died after the time at which the interest thereon was due, but before it was declared by the company to be payable, the tenant for life contending that it was to be treated as income, and the remainderman that it formed part of the testator's estate; and the Vice-Chancellor held that railway debentures, being in the nature of mortgages upon which interest accrues de die in diem, the portion of interest which accrued due in the lifetime of the testator was capital, as between the tenant for life and remainderman. If the Vice-Chancellor had considered that railway debentures were analogous to Government stock, and the interest upon the one analogous to the dividends upon the other, he would probably have held that the provisions of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 2, applied to the case of railway debentures, so that, whether the Act applied or not, the result in this respect would be the same. His Honour distinguished the two cases. In the case of debentures, as has been remarked, the interest accrues daily, although it is not payable until the end of the half year; whereas, in the case of Government stock, the dividends thereon are one entire thing, which, as it does not become due until a certain period, is properly the subject of apportionment where the party entitled to receive dies before the period of payment. Some cases not very dissimilar to Re Rogers' Trust have been before the Court within the last few years. In Clive v. Clive (Kay 600), Wood, V.C., was of opinion that in the case of a specific legacy of Bank Stock, where the testator dies a few days before the dividend day, the legatee would take the dividend, although payable in respect of profits earned during the testator's life.

In Knight v. Boughton (12 Beav. 312), Lord Langdale, M.R., held that the term "instrument" referred to in 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 2, does not imply an instrument creating the periodic payments, but that which creates a life interest therein. And in Plummer v. Whiteley (1 John. 585), Wood, V.C., decided that the section applies to all cases in which the instrument creating the life interest has been executed since the passing of the Act.

PRACTICE—SPECIAL CASE—REVIVOR.

Wilson v. Whitley, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 52.

In this case Wood, V.C., made an order of revivor in a special case, which had been abated by the death of the plaintiff, thus treating a special case as a "suit" within 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

COMMON LAW.

LIABILITY OF LANDLORDS WHO DEMISE RUINOUS PREMISES.

Todd v. Flight, 9 W. R., C. P., 145.

This case is an instructive one, as it throws light upon a question which frequently arises, and leads to litigation between neighbours—viz., as to the liability which by law attaches in respect of some accident happening, or nuisance existing, on one or other of the premises. The present decision is the more interesting because it lays down a broad and intelligible principle for determining such liability, not easily to be collected from the previous authorities on the subject, which are not, perhaps, altogether harmonious.

The cause of action was the fall of a stack of chimneys, which injured the adjoining house; and the proceedings were taken by and against the reversioner of each house—that is to say, by and against the landlords of the respective tenants. As to the proper plaintiff no question was raised; for it is clear law that in such cases either the occupier or the owner of the injured premises may sue and recover damages for the injury he has suffered; the one in his possession, the other in his reversion. But the proceedings being taken against the landlord of the house from which the chimneys had fallen—relying on the fact that the landlord had demised the premises, knowing them to be in a dangerous condition—the declaration was demurred to; and the substantial question was thus directly raised, whether, under such circumstances, the tenant or the landlord was liable; or, more accurately perhaps, whether the scienter of the landlord rendered him liable.

Against the landlord's liability there are not wanting plausible arguments. It might be said, for example, that, though at one time it was considered (see Bush v. Steinman, 1 Bos. & P. 404), that a peculiar degree of liability attaches to the owners of land and buildings, and that they are responsible for the conduct of all those whom they either mediate or immediately bring upon their premises, this doctrine has been, by later authorities, completely exploded; and that with regard to nuisances in particular, it has been often held that a man who has once acquired a power to abate one which exists on the premises he occupies, and suffers it to remain nevertheless, may be sued for its continuance. For example, in one case it was held that a tenant who took a house with an unenclosed area, was liable to be sued in damages by a passer by who fell through (Coupland v. Hardingham, 3 Camp. 398). In another, the lessee of a watermill was held liable for continuing the banks of the mill-pond at an improper elevation, though they had been so erected by the lessor before the demise (Brent v. Haddon, Cro. Jac. 555). And, generally, in reference to the duty of keeping premises in such a state of repair as not to be a nuisance to the neighbourhood, recent cases have established the law to be that the occupier, as distinguished from the owner, is responsible—the tenant of the particular estate as distinct from the reversioner (see Russell v. Shenton, 3 Q. B. 449; Chauntler v. Robinson, 4 Exch. 169).

The Court of Common Pleas, however, while admitting the authority of the cases cited at the bar (which comprised some of those above instanced) for the defendant, yet gave judgment for the plaintiff on the following ground. The true question they remarked, in such cases is, upon whom does the duty of repairing fall? If the tenant is bound by his lease to repair, and fails to do so, then the action may be brought against him; even if an action lies also against the landlord. Again, if a man has the ownership of premises on which he knows a nuisance to exist, he cannot get rid of his liability for its continuance by parting with the present possession. Once more, the duty of repair, and by consequence the liability for damage caused by non-repair, will be on the tenant and not the landlord, if having taken premises in good repair, and being bound to keep them so by the terms of his lease, he allows them to get into a state of nuisance. Though even in such a case (as was remarked by the Queen's Bench in Rex v. Pedley, 1 A. & E. 822) the landlord may make himself liable for a nuisance which has been erected or improperly suffered to arise by his tenant, if having the opportunity to get rid of him the landlord renews the tenancy.

It is to be observed that in the present case the nature of the covenants, as between the defendant and his tenant, does not appear. It may therefore be that the action might, at the option of the plaintiff, have been brought against the occupier instead of the landlord. All that the case decides is, that it was rightly brought against the landlord, and this by reason of the ruinous condition of the chimneys being known to and as it were adopted by him when he let the premises. Hence in such an action as the present, the whole gist is the knowledge of the nuisance on the part of the defendant.

CONFLICT OF CLAIMS BETWEEN A JUDGMENT CREDITOR AND THE ASSIGNEES OF JUDGMENT DEBTOR, IN RESPECT OF A DEBT ATTACHED.

Tilbury v. Brown, 9 W. R., B. C., 147.

This case establishes the doctrine that the right to attach a debt due to a judgment debtor, under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, is qualified by the superior right of such judgment debtor's assignees, if he becomes bankrupt after the service of the attachment order and demand under it, but prior to payment made or to execution levied by seizure and sale.

The question of priority of rights under the garnishee clauses of the Act of 1854 and the Bankrupt Consolidation Act of 1849, did not arise for the first time in the present case. It was discussed and decided in Holmes v. Tutton (5 Ell. & Bl. 65). And it was there held that the effect of the service of an attachment order on the judgment debtor was only to make the judgment creditor a creditor of the estate of the bankrupt judgment debtor, with security for his debt under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 184; but did not give him a lien on the debt attached. Now, by the terms of that section, a creditor of a bankrupt having such security, is only to come in with the other creditors, except before the date of the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, he has actually issued execution (and seized and sold thereunder), or unless he has a "mortgage" or "lien" on the bankrupt's property. Hence it was also held in Holmes v. Tutton, that the rights of the general creditors to share in what was owing to the judgment debtor were superior to those of the judgment creditor; and the present case turned upon precisely the same principle—the only distinction being, that whereas in Holmes v. Tutton the garnishee order had been under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 61, and therefore was made ex parte, in the present case it was made under s. 63—that is, after default made by the garnishee; and was, therefore, to the effect that execution against him should forthwith issue, without giving him any alternative. The Court, however, thought that this distinction made no difference, and again decided in favour of the assignees.

LIABILITIES OF LODGING-HOUSE KEEPERS.

However we may differ in opinion as to the expediency of the law which exempts lodging-house keepers from liability for the lost goods of their lodgers, the fact cannot be denied, that the law so exempts them, and distinguishes their liabilities, whether rightly or wrongly, from innkeepers, who are liable for the lost goods of travellers. The cases clearly settle this distinction. Instead of asking, however, why lodging-house keepers are not equally liable with innkeepers in this respect, we might, perhaps, more properly ask, why innkeepers are liable to such an extraordinary burthen. The answer for this would appear to be found in the tendencies of the common law to promote commerce by facilitating the inland carrying trade. It consequently imposed extraordinary duties upon innkeepers and common carriers, but not upon lodging-house keepers. Gentlemen's Acts were then unknown, and facilities were given to make profits to pay debt, but not to lose one's goods unnecessarily.

The obligation is imposed by the law, not on account of the moral or natural obligation the innkeeper is under to know the class of persons frequenting his inn, as your correspondent C. (anté p. 131), puts it, but because the traveller has not the means or time to acquire this special knowledge; a reason which does not apply to a lodger, who may, if I may state a case testing the principle to the utmost, stay in a hotel with a legal assurance for his goods, until he ascertains that the character of the house renders it unsafe for him more permanently to sojourn there.

COMMISSIONERS TO ADMINISTER OATHS.

The 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78, which is, I think, the latest enactment relating to the powers of commissioners to administer oaths, is silent as to their duties. I have no doubt, however, that such a commissioner is a public officer within the scope of the principle of Ashby v. White (1 S. Leading Cases, 105), and would be liable to an action by any party whom he refused to swear after tender of the fee, and without any adequate cause for his refusal. A commissioner is, of course, appointed for the benefit of the public, and not for the convenience of his friends or acquaintances.

PROFESSIONAL REMUNERATION.

In reply to "A Solicitor of nearly fifty years' standing" (ante p. 146), I beg to state that the Law Amendment Society did publish a report on "Professional Remuneration," in 1858. The report is a remarkably happy application of the principles of economical science to the determination of this question. Its leading principle is, that private contract should, as a general rule, be allowed to determine professional remuneration, as is the case in most other contracts between employers and the employed. A percentage on the purchase-money of estates sold, is likewise recommended by the report—settled scales of costs to be used only for determining the amount of costs to be charged in the absence of special agreements, and to regulate costs as between party and party, or when the fund in court is to be charged with costs. The last-named class of cases would appear suitable to be left to the discretion of the judges adjudicating upon the rights to which the costs are incident, and, therefore, able to estimate the actual work performed. Although, however, recent legislation has extended judicial discretion as to costs—upon which I do not at present offer any opinion—it does not appear to me desirable to give judges such a discretion over persons who are daily appearing before them.

Nothing can be more absurd than that a solicitor, who gives advice during the progress of a suit, can receive no fee therefor, but can by sending a case to counsel; the law thus holds out a temptation to him to protract every case, and spin out every deed with a copious addition of unnecessary matter, the fruitful seeds of an inheritance of litigation to his successors in the profession. It is a fallacy to suppose that cheap law will multiply professional transactions, inasmuch as these are occasioned by a number of causes upon which cheap law and cheap stamps could have little influence. No cheapness of law would much increase the number of settlements, &c.; I might even add conveyances. An easiness, but not a multiplication, of transfers, would be effected by a cheap system of conveyancing. And, even with regard to those classes of cases which a cheapness of the legal remedy would pro priore vigore tend to increase, the uncertainty of the amount of the solicitor's bill in each individual case would fully neutralize the abstract advantage. Private agreement is the basis of professional remuneration, which is alike recommended by scientific principles (that can by no means be limited to the sphere of unskilled labour), as well as by the voice of the profession, and doubtless, by the public, if their votes could be taken on the question.

MR. LOCKE KING'S ACT, 17 & 18 VICT. c. 113.— EXONERATION.

If you will favour me with the insertion in your journal of this communication, probably some of your readers will be able to throw some light upon the following:—

"A person dies after the 31st December, 1854, seised of an estate in land, which at his death stands charged with the payment of a sum of money by way of mortgage. He leaves a will made before the 1st January, 1855, disposing of all his personal estate, but by which the estate in land cannot pass; which was, in fact, purchased subsequently to the making of the will."

Under these circumstances is the heir entitled to have the mortgage debt paid off out of the personal estate? What is the construction of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, with reference to the point? How does the last proviso bear upon it? And is there a decided case upon the construction of that proviso?

The Provinces.

DEVONSHIRE.—At the Devon quarter sessions, held last week, a committee of magistrates, appointed for the purpose, recommended that salaries, on the basis of a five years' average of fees, travelling expenses, and allowances, in accordance with the recent Act, with 10 per cent. in addition, on account of an anticipated increase in the number of inquests, be paid to the county coroners. Several of the coroners attended, and protested against the small amount of remuneration which this would give them. They complained that they had been receiving only ninepence per mile for travelling expenses, whereas they could not travel for less than a shilling per mile, and that the fees for holding inquests when they were adjourned were not sufficient in such large districts as they had allotted to them. One of the coroners, Mr. Cox, said the salary proposed to be paid to him would only be at the rate of 5s. 8d. per day, and that he should be reluctantly compelled to appeal to the Secretary of State. Ultimately the subject was referred back to the committee for reconsideration.

MANCHESTER.—At the Manchester Chamber of Commerce the Sub-Committee on the Bankruptcy Law brought up their report on Monday last, and the following memorial to Sir R. Bethell was unanimously adopted:—"The memorial, &c., sheweth,—That in the opinion of your memorialists, the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Laws are so defective, expensive, and uncertain in their administration as to induce creditors to accept compositions of an objectionable character under private arrangement rather than incur the cost of bankruptcy; that your memorialists have heard with satisfaction that it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce into Parliament next session a Bill for the Amendment and Consolidation of the Laws of Bankruptcy and Insolvency; that, while your memorialists cheerfully acknowledge the care and attention bestowed by her Majesty's Government on the Bill of last session they, nevertheless, are of opinion that the said Bill was capable of great improvement in many important details. That in the opinion of your memorialists no Bankruptcy Bill can be satisfactory unless it be short and simple in its provisions, inexpensive in its operation, and uniform in its administration. It should also greatly reduce the staff of officers connected with the court, should provide for the payment of those officers by fixed salaries, should give every facility for the proof of debts, should place the control of the estate in the hands of the trade assignees, and should afford opportunity to a majority of the creditors representing three-fourths in value to wind-up the estate of a debtor in any manner they may think best, under the sanction of the court, but without official control or interference. That with a view to effecting the change with as little expense as possible the services of present efficient officers should, wherever practicable, be retained, and compensation to retiring officers should be economically arranged. That your memorialists approve of making an execution upon a judgment an act of bankruptcy for a period not exceeding 14 days, and are of opinion that in all cases the sheriff should be compelled to sell by public auction, and to retain possession of the proceeds of the sale until the execution had ceased to be an act of bankruptcy, when the amount shall be paid over to the execution creditor absolutely. That your memorialists are of opinion that whenever a bankrupt has been proved to have committed fraud, been guilty of reckless trading, extravagance, or any other misdemeanour in connexion with his estate, it shall be in the power of the commissioner to adjudge punishment on his own warrant for any period of imprisonment not exceeding two years, in lieu of the existing power of suspension and classification of certificates. That your memorialists approve of provision being made for winding-up the estates of deceased debtors in the Bankruptcy Court, where there is reasonable ground for believing the estate to be insolvent. That, in the opinion of your memorialists, the Lord Chancellor should have power to remove the judge, or any other officer of the court. Your memorialists therefore pray that you will take the foregoing suggestions into your early and favourable consideration. And your memorialists will ever pray. &c.—EDMUND POTTER, President.—Manchester, Jan. 9."

NOTTINGHAM.—At the recent Nottingham sessions, Mr. Henry Bell, Barrister, of Leicester, of considerable practice in the Midland Circuit, whilst in the robing room, waiting the commencement of business, was seized with apoplexy, and died the same afternoon.

READING.—Berkshire Quarter Sessions.—These sessions

began on Monday, the 31st ult., at Reading, and the experiment was made of transacting the business in one of the courts of the new assize building, which has been in course of erection during the last two years. The contract for the courts was taken by Mr. Myers, of London, and it was stipulated that they should have been completed by Easter, 1859, but certain alterations in the original plans, and the strike which occurred several months ago in the building trade, causing a suspension of the work, have greatly delayed the time for opening the courts to the business of the county. It has only been by great exertions that the Crown Court could be got into such a state of readiness as to admit of the present sessions being held in it. The plan for the building was prepared by Mr. J. B. Clacy, architect, of Reading, and in the whole arrangements he appears to have been successful in affording, not only accommodation, but comfort and convenience to all parties attending for business either at sessions or assizes. The gentlemen of the bar present generally expressed themselves satisfied with the arrangements made for their convenience. There were a large number of magistrates present at the opening of the court.

The New Law as to County Coroners—The Clerk of the Peace having read the new Act requiring that on and after the 1st of January, 1861, county coroners should be paid by salary instead of fees, Sir W. G. Hayter, M.P., moved that a committee be appointed to confer with the coroners with reference to the salaries which they were to receive. As the Act of Parliament directed that the magistrates should come to an agreement with the coroners, he did not see how an agreement could be entered into unless both parties met and conferred together. That conference could not take place in open court, but the whole of the facts might be ascertained in committee, and a report made to the Court as to what it would be advisable to do. The Act gave the coroners the power of appealing to the Secretary of State if they were not satisfied with the amount proposed to be paid to them, but that alternative he thought it was desirable to avoid. The motion was unanimously adopted by the Court.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

COUR IMPERIALE D'ALGER.

(From the Gazette des Tribunaux, by WILLIAM HACKETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.)

FOREIGNERS IN ALGERIA—MARRIED WOMAN—LEGAL MORTGAGE.

The wife of a foreigner, herself a foreigner, has a right of "legal" mortgage upon the property of her husband situated in Algeria, although, by the law of the country where the marriage was contracted, she would not have been entitled to it.

Foreigners established in Algeria are presumed to be domiciled there with the authorisation of the Government, and therefore enjoy the civil rights conferred by the French laws.

In this case an appeal was presented by Madame Frentzel from a judgment of the Civil Tribunal of Constantine. The appellant and her husband were natives of Bavaria settled in Algeria, and the object of the original suit was to obtain a declaration that Madame Frentzel was not entitled to a legal mortgage over the property of her husband. The court below decided that Madame Frentzel being a foreigner, and having contracted marriage under the laws which obtain in Bavaria, was not entitled to a legal mortgage over the property of her husband situated in France. The principal facts of the case will sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Imperial Court. It may, however, be of use to premise that by the civil code of France mortgages (hypothèques) are of three kinds—legal, judicial, and conventional. A legal mortgage is one which arises by operation of law, as in the case of a legacy, where the legatee has a legal mortgage over the property of the testator, and in the case of a sale, where the vendor has a legal mortgage for the amount of the unpaid purchase money. A judicial mortgage is one which results from decision or acts of the court; and a conventional mortgage is similar to an English mortgage, and arises by agreement between the parties. All mortgages must be inscribed on the registry of mortgages, and only date from the time of the inscription. In the present case the appellant was posterior in point of time to the respondent, and ought therefore, it would seem, to have been postponed to him; but the case was argued solely on the ground that Madame Frentzel, as a foreigner, was not entitled to a legal mortgage on the estate of her husband. The decision was as follows:—

"The Court:—Considering, in fact, that M. Frentzel and Sophia Mayer contracted a marriage on the 9th of September, 1845, at Annern, in the palatinate in the kingdom of Bavaria; that the spouses adopted the régime of a community of goods, confined to the acquisitions made during marriage, in the manner directed by the Code Napoléon (régime de communauté réduite aux acquêts); that in 1850 they left Bavaria for Constantine, where they took up their abode; that on the 8th of July, 1851, M. Frentzel purchased real estate in the suburbs of that city, and established a tannery, which he worked in conjunction with Simon Seligman, up to October, 1856, when the said partnership was dissolved; that the liquidation of the affairs of the partnership having constituted the latter a creditor as regarded Frentzel for the sum of £500, Simon Seligman took, on the date of the 23rd of the same month, an inscription of mortgage on the realty belonging to his debtor; that, on the other hand, Madame Frentzel having obtained a decree of separate estate as regarded her husband, and having ascertained her rights, took, on the 11th of June, 1857, an inscription of legal mortgage over the present and future goods of her husband, as a security for the sum of £450, to which, according to the Act of Liquidation, she was found entitled; that such being the state of things, Simon Seligman did, by a writ of the 27th of June, 1857, summon Frentzel, husband and wife, claiming, first, to annul the judgment of separation as to property between the husband and wife; secondly, to obtain the erasure of the inscription of mortgage taken by Madame Frentzel; that by a judgment of the 20th of July, 1858, the first part of the demand was refused; and that by a judgment of the 30th of November, 1858, the Tribunal of Constantine granted the second portion of the demand made by Seligman, and ordered the erasure of the inscription taken by Madame Frentzel, and that from this latter decision appeal has been made:

"Considering that, without excepting on the ground of a defect in the transcription, or for the lateness of the inscription, Simon Seligman has confined himself, in seeking for this erasure, to objecting to Madame Frentzel, that on principle a foreign woman, married in a foreign country, is not entitled to a legal mortgage over the goods of her husband situated in France; that this, therefore, is the only question to be examined in order to determine the rights of the parties;

"Considering that, in order to solve this question, it is of importance to compare the different modes of disposition which create the various species of hypothecary rights; that in effect, unlike the judicial mortgage and the conventional mortgage, which the law only grants to foreigners in the cases and under the conditions contemplated by the articles 2,123 and 2,128 of the Code Napoléon, legal mortgage, in the terms of articles 2,121 and 2,124 of the same Code, is a result of the law, for the benefit of every married woman without distinction; that if the legislator did not, in the case of legal mortgage, make any of the distinctions which he has introduced into the two other species of mortgage, it is because he desired that the benefit of this special protection should be attached to marriage itself, for the reason that the foreigner as well as the Frenchwoman is placed by marriage in a state of dependence, for which the advantages arising from the right of obtaining a legal mortgage acts as a counterpoise.

"Considering, on the other hand, that realty situated in France, even when the property of foreigners, is governed by the French law; whence it follows that it is subject to all the charges imposed by that law, and that the moment a foreigner acquires realty in France, he acquires it on condition that it be governed by the French law, and, consequently, with the charge of legal mortgage which the law has attached to his quality of married man, whatever may be his country.

"That it is in vain objected that legal mortgage is an effect of civil right, and, consequently, can only benefit the natives of the country; that in effect it is evident that mortgage, whether conventional or judiciary, is obtainable by foreigners; that, consequently, this benefit is not exclusively attached to the quality of French citizens, and that there is no reason, in the case of legal mortgage, to make an exception not formalized by the law; that if the formalities of inscription, and the mode of exercise of the hypothecary right, are a matter of civil right, it must be acknowledged that the right of mortgage, taken in itself, belongs to the law of nations, and that it ought, in consequence, to protect the foreigner as well as the Frenchwoman.

"Considering, moreover, that supposing legal mortgage is exclusively derived from the civil right, Madame Frentzel may still claim the benefit of it; that, in effect, in the terms of the 13th article of the Code Napoléon, the enjoyment of civil rights in the case of a stranger, results from the establishment of his domicile in France, with the authorisation of the Government as long as he continues to reside there; that, on the other hand, this authorisation is not subject to any regular rule, but may tacitly result from facts and circumstances; that this solution, admissible as it is in France, is especially applicable in Algeria, where strangers are admitted to a participation of rights which in France are only given to the natives.

"Considering that, from all that precedes, it results that Madame Frentzel was fully entitled to inscribe herself, and that this inscription is a good charge on the realty in question.

"For these reasons,

"The Court reverses the decision appealed from, maintains the hypothecary inscription, &c., &c."

EXCESS OF JURISDICTION—FOREIGN CONSUL.

Nov. 16th, 1860.—Bailey v. Hatfield, Consul of the United States of America.—In this case, where the American consul had been sued in the Small Causes Court of Bombay for moneys received in his consular capacity, and a verdict obtained by the plaintiff, also a domiciled citizen of the United States, a rule to show cause why a prohibition should not issue to the three judges of that court, on the ground of excess of jurisdiction, was obtained by Mr. Chisholm Anstey, on behalf of the consulate of the United States.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows:—The defendant was consul at Bombay, for the government of the United States of America. An American ship arrived at the port of Bombay last year, in a disabled state, and was sold by the captain, when the officers and crew were discharged by the consul, who, in discharge of his duty as consul, required the captain to pay into the consul's hands, three months' extra wages for all the American officers and seamen of the ship, which was done. The present plaintiff was the first officer of the ship, and one of the persons in respect of whom the consul had received three months' extra wages. The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant two-thirds of that amount, and for that purpose took out a summons in the Small Causes Court at Bombay, to the jurisdiction of which the consul objected, and the question was now tried by a writ of prohibition to stay the proceedings in the Small Causes Court. The ground of the application was that the laws of the United States and the consular instructions were contrary to the decision of the Small Causes Court. A very elaborate argument, which occupies five or six columns of the local newspapers, took place before the Supreme Court. As the question of the privilege of consuls is one of general interest, and as the judgment in the present case was delivered after a full consideration of all the English authorities upon the subject, we have on doubt that the following will be interesting to our readers.

The CHIEF JUSTICE read the judgment of the Court, which, after setting forth the main facts of the case, proceeded to state that the amount claimed in the action being clearly within the jurisdiction of the Small Causes Court, their lordships were of opinion that the exemption claimed in respect to that court ought to be treated as if it were claimed by plea to the jurisdiction of the supreme court itself. The claim is of the most general description, and asserts exemption from the jurisdiction in all matters of merely consular duty. Now the general rule is laid down in the consular regulations of the United States (s. 584) that these consuls are to be considered liable to the jurisdictions of the countries where they dwell (see also Story Conf. of Laws, ss. 541-3). The acts of Congress relating to merchant seamen make consuls liable for their acts and defaults under those enactments, to damages and penalties (Act of July, 1840, s. 18); Act of the 18th August, 1856, s. 26-32). There is, therefore, no ground for the claim to this exemption. Nothing short of extra-territoriality or a treaty, could justify it. In his own courts he would be liable to this suit. Why not here? We are therefore of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. But we also think that we ought to express our opinion upon the doctrine asserted on the defendant's behalf. It is said that the facts do not constitute a case in the nature of a claim as for a debt. It is conceded that the present claim arises under the very words of the 3rd section of the Act of Congress. Now substantially this is a sum of money raised by the American Legislature for the benefit of American mariners, and to be applied for their benefit by the consul in the name of his Government. He is made subject to penalties for neglect or misuse of those powers, which penalties none but the United States Government can enforce. The case of Gidley v. Lord Palmerston (3 Br. & B. 285, Amer Rep.) has been relied upon by the defendant's counsel in answer to this action, as showing that a public officer like the consul cannot be sued for moneys so received. But the reasons there given by Dallas, C.J., for the decision in question, show that the consul ought to have put his case in a different shape from that in which it comes before us:—a plea to the jurisdiction. He should have shown that, according to the true construction of the Act of Congress, there was not imposed upon him a personal liability. The first judge of the Small Causes Court has not had the benefit of the erudite and able discussion which we have had; nor have we had the opportunity of learning what were the facts upon which he came to the decision he has pronounced. But we think that in the face of Regulations 346 and 347 this plea cannot be supported; yet, as we also think that the decision ought to have been in favour of the defendant on the merits, we discharge the rule without costs. We hope that the litigation will now cease.

Mr. Justice ARNOULD.—It appears to me that the consul should have pleaded below not in the way he has done,—“I have not received any money except in my consular capacity.” That plea was too wide, for it appears by the Acts of Congress that there are some cases in which he does incur a personal liability. But I must say that if he had said, “I have not received any money for James Bailey, but only for the United States,” in my opinion that would have been a good answer to the action.

FRANCE.—A singular point of law was lately submitted to the Imperial Court of Limoges—namely, whether bees are to be ranged in the class of what the law calls “domestic animals,” or are to be considered as “wild and ferocious.” A labourer named Sauvenet, of Chenerrilles, in the Creuse, proceeded on the 8th of October, 1859, to extract the honey from a bee-hive in the garden of his employer, a tax gatherer, named Beraud. This irritated the bees, and they flew wildly about. At that moment a farmer named Legrand, of Perpirolles, accompanied by his son, a boy of 13, came up the road in a gig, and the bees stung them and the horse severely. The animal in terror began prancing furiously, and the farmer and his son jumped from the vehicle; the boy then ran along the road, trying to avoid the bees, but the horse having started off knocked him down, and so injured him that he died in a few hours. Legrand afterwards brought an action before the Civil Tribunal of Aubusson against Beraud and Sauvenet to obtain from them 3,000 francs as indemnity for the death of his son, which he said must be considered as caused by the bees. But the Tribunal held that bees are “ferocious animals,” which no one can be expected to control, and that therefore the action could not be maintained. An appeal was presented to the Imperial Court of Limoges, and after long arguments a contrary decision was come to, the Court laying down that bees are “domestic animals,” and that the owner of them is responsible for any injury they commit. It therefore ordered that 200 francs should be paid to the plaintiff.

On the 21st ult., the Tribunal of Commerce gave a decision of interest to travellers. An advocate of Paris, named Hubbard, had occasion in February last to go to Madrid on business, and he afterwards proceeded to Alicante to take the steamer of the Messageries Impériales for Marseilles, which was advertised to leave at noon of the 17th of the month. But on presenting himself at the office of the company in the morning of that day he learned that the steamer had left on the previous evening, and he had to remain six days in the town before he could get a passage to Marseilles. For the loss of time, the inconvenience, and the expense thus occasioned, he called on the Tribunal to condemn the company of the Messageries to pay him 2,000f. The company represented that it had been obliged suddenly to modify the times of departure in obedience to orders from the Minister of War, and consequently that it was not responsible. The Tribunal, however, held that the company was bound to advertise the modification, and condemned it to pay the plaintiff 200f. and costs.

NAPLES.—By a recent regulation the fees for the extraordinary services of district judges have been fixed and reduced.

ANTICIPATED LEGISLATION OF THE SESSION 1861.

At this season of the year, rumours begin to circulate as to the Law Bills supposed to be in preparation for the next session of Parliament. Of course, no authoritative statement on the subject having been made, the speculations indulged in are not of the most reliable kind. But as it is now the fashion to "amend" the "practice" of some one or more of the courts every year—and it is expedient that the law officers of the Crown should show their zeal in law reform—it is highly probable that a batch of Law Bills will be forthcoming in due time. Chancery, of course, needs "amendment," no less than ten years having elapsed since any changes took place in the procedure of that court. Last term the business there was the reverse of plentiful; and the several equity judges and masters had an easy time of it. The anticipated changes will affect the number and designation of those courts. The masters, of whom there are four, are likely to be abolished, and a smaller number of vice-chancellors substituted. Some minor changes may also take place, pursuant to the recommendations of the Chancery Commissioners' Report, 1858; and among them, the abolition of the sinecure office of clerk of the hanaper, the consolidation of the recognizances-office with the affidavits-office, and the removal of the business arising out of lunacy to the chancery registrar's-office.

It is asserted by a morning journal that a measure will also be introduced having for its object the prevention of the publication of traders' circulars; or, as they are popularly called, "black lists." Undoubtedly these weekly prints have been condemned in strong terms from the bench; but we cannot believe that the Legislature will consent to neutralize the whole benefit derivable from registration of judgments, crown bonds, &c., by forbidding public access to the register. It is stated that many persons subscribe to these "circulars" simply because the judgments, &c., obtained against subscribers are not inserted. This is a species of bribery, and undoubtedly an abuse of the system. It would perhaps be better, considering that a reasonable degree of publicity ought to be given in these matters, that a circular should be prepared by authority of the courts, impartially stating all entries of judgments, &c. On the main question, the propriety of issuing any such circulars, opinions are still divided—lawyers disapproving of, and mercantile men and political economists defending their publication.

It is again rumoured that it is intended to abolish the Vice-Regal Court and assimilate the government of Ireland to that of Scotland or Wales. In theory, the office of viceroy might well be abolished, without injury to any real interest of the country. Socially and economically a visit now and then from any member of the royal family would do more good to Ireland than the constant presence of what cannot be regarded as other than a "mock court." Yet the vice-regal institution was created, or rather allowed to stand, as part of the terms of the legislative union. While the majority of the Irish nation are anxious to retain it, even for reasons of a sentimental kind, it would be ungracious and unwise to abolish the vice-royalty. With this project another is constantly associated in the minds of all opponents of centralization. It is said that the superior courts of law in Ireland must follow the Vice-Regal Court, that the county courts will have enlarged jurisdiction, but that all important causes will be finally heard at Westminster or Lincoln's-inn. This we regard as a groundless fear; for the whole tendency of modern legislation is to localize the administration of justice, and, besides this, it has of late been a common though a pernicious custom to enact separate laws for Ireland.

But although the Irish county courts will in the civil and criminal code retain their place as inferior courts for small causes, they require very much improvement, especially by rendering the session a monthly instead of a quarterly one. This would vastly increase their utility, and would also promote the well-being of the rural districts, by handing over most of the justices of the peace work to more competent hands. It is to be hoped that the coming session will not pass away without this important change being effected.

ACCIDENT TO THE RIGHT HON. A. BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster, Q.C., formerly Attorney-General, and now leading counsel in the Court of Chancery, met with a severe accident on the 4th instant, while shooting over the preserves of Mr. Bernal Osborne, in Tipperary. His gun, a breech-loader, exploded, sending the charge and ram-rod through his hand. Medical aid was at once procured, and Mr. Brewster's relatives were telegraphed for, including his son Colonel Brewster, of the Inns of Court Volunteer Corps. The last accounts state that the wound is likely to heal and that all dangerous symptoms have subsided; but Mr. Brewster was not able to attend to his briefs as usual at the beginning of term.

QUARTER SESSIONS ARDEE, COUNTY LOUTH.

At the Ardee Quarter Sessions, on the 3rd instant, all the solicitors practising in the court retired from it in a body, leaving the chairman Mr. John Leahy, Q.C., to conduct personally the cases of plaintiffs and defendants. The cause of this legal "strike" was as follows:—Mr. Leahy at the last sessions declared that in future he should allow one solicitor only to act on each side; whereas at this bar (where counsel do not ordinarily attend) it has long been the custom, in the heavier cases, for two solicitors to appear on each side. Recently the solicitors held a meeting, and resolved not to appear at all in case the chairman persisted in enforcing what they hold to be an arbitrary and illegal restriction. On the present occasion the chairman reiterated his determination; and after a temperate but earnest remonstrance by Mr. McKenna, Mr. McMahon, Mr. Byrne, and Mr. Caraher, which was ineffectual, these gentlemen and also the other solicitors present, rose and left the court.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS IN IRELAND.

The reformatory movement, commenced in 1851, was for some years confined to England; but in 1858 an Act was passed extending it to Ireland. There are now committees in full operation, of both Protestant and Catholic Reformatories; and their progress, so far, has been very encouraging. The Protestant girls' school was opened in April, 1859, and the boys' school, in December, 1859; and if the numbers of children in these schools is but small, it is because the great majority of juvenile delinquents are intrusted to the Catholic reformatory schools. The Government allowance is seven shillings a week per head, to which 2s. weekly is added by the grand jury or corporation (as the case may be) of the district; the residue of the outlay is made up by voluntary subscription. It is very satisfactory to find that whereas in the year 1857, there were condemned to penal servitude 48 boys, in the year 1860, or since the establishment of these reformatories, only four boys were so condemned. The above facts we gathered from statements made by Mr. C. Cobbe, D.L., and Mr. A. E. Gayer, Q.C., at a meeting of friends of the reformatory movement held on Monday last at the Mansion House, Dublin.

Law Amendment Society.

At a general meeting of this society, held on the 17th ult., Mr. Edward Webster, barrister-at-law, read a very able and elaborate paper, entitled "Observations on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords, 1856, relating to the expediency of carrying into effect the sentence of death before official spectators only, and remarks on a substitute for capital punishment."

Mr. Webster, after referring to the report, and to the recommendations of the committee, that executions should take place, in private in the presence of officials appointed for the purpose, and referring also to the evidence taken before the committee, observed, that though it did not justify the report, yet it established a fact of the last importance, viz., that executions had on the spectators no deterring effect, and therefore, that as public exhibitions, they were useless. With respect to the question whether a sufficient punishment can be substituted for that of death, Mr. Webster said:—

"Let the sentence, after a verdict of guilty, in murder cases be imprisonment for life in a gaol or ward appropriated for murderers; let it be irreversible save by Act of Parliament, for the prerogative of mercy might well be abandoned in exchange for the great public object of making convictions in cases of murder certain. This sentence of perpetual imprisonment would be far more terrible and severe than that of death, and it would relieve the Crown of a most painful responsibility, doubtless oftentimes personally felt. It would, moreover, inflict a punishment not altogether irremediable, one that might be stayed in its progress and in some degree compensated, should the innocence of the convict be, after verdict, established. All morbid attempts to obtain a remission of the sentence by application through the Home Office to the prerogative would be for ever prevented, and hence the officers employed there would be relieved, for the public benefit, of much and very anxious labour, whilst the convict would have an appeal to the legislature. Moreover, if the convict had no art ready for the purpose, let him after sentence be made to learn one, whereby he might in some way earn money to pay the expense of his maintenance. Let him be placed in solitary confinement at stated intervals, and let him be allowed to associate, and that not frequently, with criminals of his own blood-stained order—and with such criminals only—save such rare intercourse with others as would be necessary to compel him to earn his bread, to secure his escape from gaol, and to afford him the consolations of religion. Let there be one prison for all convicted of this hateful crime, and there let the malicious destroyer of his fellow-creature live, isolated from that society he has so foully injured—a prey to the remorse of a guilty conscience, the associate at intervals of criminals like himself—having no hope in this life, save that of making his peace with his Creator ere his existence on this earth be by a natural death terminated, and his spirit thereby sent into that future and undiscovered world to which he has maliciously, violently, and prematurely hurried that of his unfortunate victim."

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

The following is the last report of Mr. Wingate, the new Secretary of this society:—

In making my first report to you of the proceedings of the society since the annual meeting in July last, I will avail myself of the opportunity to remark upon some matters which seem to me to be deserving your consideration, as being intimately connected with its support and progress. Before recapitulating the most important of the society's transactions, I would premise that its thanks are due to those old members who showed their kindly feeling and remembrance by attending our annual dinner, as well as to those barristers and gentlemen who honoured us with their presence upon that occasion; and also to the Solicitors' Journal and the Law Times, for having gratuitously inserted in their columns the last report of the committee. Since July the society has, by Mr. Miller's resignation, been deprived of the valuable services of that gentleman, to whom a vote of thanks was accorded for the energetic and uniform kindness and urbanity which distinguished his conduct during the long period he discharged the office of treasurer. Mr. Lawrance was subsequently elected treasurer, by which a vacancy was made in the committee, and Mr. Bradford has been elected to perform the duties of that important office in conjunction with his colleagues.

At the first meeting a motion of some importance was carried, which has the effect of adhering more strictly to rule No. 6, namely, "That the practice of members present at a meeting of the society, putting down the names of friends who are absent, be discontinued, and those only who have sent written notice to the secretary of their intention of being absent, be not fined." The society was well represented at the Michaelmas examination, 3 members having ably distinguished themselves. We have held 8 meetings, at which 5 legal and 3 jurisprudential questions were discussed. The average number of members present has been 24; of speakers, 7; of members voting, 14; and the average length of the debate 2 hours 6 minutes. It is to be remarked, however, that these statistics are somewhat below the usual average, a circumstance that can only be remedied by individual application and exertion.

The society now consists of about 100 members, 40 senior, 15 of whom have attended the debates, and 60 junior members—16 new members having been elected, but 2 have not qualified. Your committee have met twice for the examination of questions and the dispatch of business connected with the society. Thirteen questions have been discussed, 9 of which were approved and have appeared in the papers. I wish, however, to draw your particular attention to the danger of the society being left entirely without questions appropriate for discussion. This difficulty has been the constant regret of various reports hitherto presented to you. We are in the constant habit of reading modern cases, which would have been most interesting for this society to discuss, had it been made acquainted with the circumstances giving rise to the litigation. I would suggest that members, if they bear the interests of the society in mind, would frequently, in the course of their business and studies, meet with facts suggestive of, or well fitted for, framing a question to be submitted for debate; and the decision of the point afterwards by the Court would give an excellent opportunity to measure the soundness of the opinion formed by the society; and the great difficulty of providing questions would thus in some degree be obviated. Formerly, there was a rule of the society imposing a fine for not furnishing questions, and rule 10 still provides for their supply by members. I trust, therefore, it may not become necessary to reimpose a penalty, but that the mention of our wants will so stimulate the industry of members, that by a constant plenitude of questions the necessity for further observation may be prevented.

GEO. T. WINGATE, Secretary.

Obituary.

JAMES RUSSELL, ESQ., Q.C.

It is with much regret we have to notice the death of this eminent lawyer, the once well-known leader of Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce's court. About four years ago Mr. Russell fell into delicate health, and blindness came on, of a character indicating permanency, being, in a great degree, the result of overwork during his thirty years' large practice at the bar. Mr. Russell had graduated with great distinction at Glasgow University, and in 1822 launched himself in the Court of Chancery, having been introduced to Lord Eldon by the late Earl of Harewood. It was not long before Mr. Russell was appointed authorised reporter of the court. Bankruptcy practice quickly allied itself to his already large chancery business, so that, in 1841, he was compelled to take silk, a change of position which he assumed reluctantly, though wisely, as the result proved. Some of his pupils well remember a statement with which their able and kind-hearted instructor used to encourage them (when making his £5,000 a-year)—namely, that his first year at the bar produced him but a guinea; and that in those days he used to be satisfied if the long vacation commenced late in September instead of early in August, as at present. In 1839 Mr. Russell, having acquired an independence, married Miss Cholmeley. Mrs. Russell survives her husband with three daughters and four sons.

Mr. Russell was a man of great learning and ability, having an intuitive aptitude for law; but he was not remarkable for eloquence or brilliancy in court. He was brief in an unusual manner,—not by rapidity of diction, but by putting forward only what was material. There was method in his discourse, which the judicious perceived, though it escaped the multitude. Mr. Russell always seized the right points of a case, and his opinions were universally sought after. In his private relations he was amiable, cordial, social, and generous; after his marriage he practised a laudable and liberal hospitality; and though he was careful of money, no deserving member of the legal profession brought low by adversity ever appealed to him in vain.

THE TWENTY-NINTH CANON OF THE CHURCH.—Representations have been made by the Clergy at several recent meetings of convocation of the inconvenience of a strict adherence to the provisions of the 29th Canon of the Church, and urging the fact that it was a great impediment in the way of parents of the poorer classes bringing their children for baptism. Accordingly at the meetings of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury held last year, a petition to her Majesty from both houses, was agreed to, praying that Convocation might be granted a royal license to be allowed to repeal the 29th Canon, and to make and promulge a new Canon in its place. Towards the close of the last session of Parliament, Sir G. Lewis, the Home Secretary, stated in the House of Commons that her Majesty had acceded to the petition, and that the royal license had been granted for the purpose required. Since that time a joint committee of both houses of convocation has had frequent sittings in London, and a case was prepared to be submitted to Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Sir Hugh Cairns, the Attorney and Solicitor-General respectively of the late Government. The questions put were the following:—
 "1. Is that portion of the 29th Canon of the Convocation of Canterbury, which enacts that 'No parent shall be admitted to answer as godfather for his own child,' declaratory of the ancient usage and law of the Church of England? 2. If that portion of the 29th Canon be altered or repealed by the Convocation of Canterbury, and the alteration or repeal be sanctioned by her Majesty, would such alteration have the effect of relieving the members of the Church in the province of Canterbury from the obligation now lying upon them in reference to sponsors? 3. If the 29th Canon should be altered or repealed by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, what steps, if any, ought to be taken by the prelates and clergy of the Irish provinces with a view to preserve uniformity of discipline throughout the United Church?" The learned gentlemen have replied as follows:—"1 and 2. Having regard to the provisions contained in the Book of Common Prayer annexed to the Act of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 4: and having regard as well to the state of the canon law at the time of the passing of that Act as to the ancient usage and law of the Church of England, we are of opinion that any alteration or repeal of the 29th Canon, such as is proposed by the Convocation of Canterbury, would not, even sanctioned by her Majesty, have the effect of relieving the members of the Church, lay or clerical, in the province of Canterbury, from the obligation, which we think now exists, that a child shall be presented for baptism by sponsors, being persons other than its parents. 3. Being of opinion that any repeal of the 29th Canon by Convocation would be inoperative, it does not appear to us that, in the event of such repeal by the Convocations of Canterbury and York, it would be necessary that any step should be taken with a view to preserve uniformity of discipline throughout the United Church." The whole subject will be again brought under the consideration of Convocation at its next sitting in February.

INSURANCE WINNING UP IN CHANCERY.—Forty-two insurance companies are being wound up in Chancery: they are the following:—Amazon, Athenæum Life, Birkbeck, British and Foreign Reliance, Marine, Caxton, Commercial and General, Cosmopolitan, Deposit and General, Era, General Commission, General Indemnity, General Live Stock, Herald, Home Counties, Hull and London Fire, Hull and London Life, Independent, Justice, Lancashire Guarantee, Liverpool Marine, Provident, London and County Cattle, London and County Life, London Mercantile Life, London and Westminster, Mercantile Guarantee, Merchant Traders, Mitre, National Alliance, Nelson Sea Voyagers, Newcastle-upon-Tyne Marine, Oak, Observer, Parental, Port of London, Phoenix Life, Protestant, Sea, Fire and Life, Security, Solvency Mutual, Tontine, Universal Provident, York and London.

LIFE ASSURANCE POLICIES.—The increased rate of mortality experienced by many of the older offices among their accepted lives, (from causes quite irrespective of the known additional rates consequent upon their increased ages), is considered to be of serious importance by many writers. It is judged by them, and rightly judged, to arise from the power which the assured possess of abandoning policies on robust lives, and of continuing those on lives which have become deteriorated. It has not, however, been sufficiently observed that there are two causes which prevent this power of the policy holder, in a large number of instances, from operating quite so adversely as is supposed against the interests of the assurance companies, which are these:—1. That the wise and prudent, who are, as a class, from their habits of careful thought and moderation in all things, the best lives, will cling even in adversity to their life policies. 2. The spendthrift and the profligate, who may be considered, as a class, to be bad lives, are those who, from their improvident habits, yield to the first temptation to dispose of their policies of assurance.

The number of bankruptcies gazetted last year was 1,266, of which 643 occurred in the metropolitan, and 623 in the provincial districts; Liverpool figuring for 71, Manchester for 64, Birmingham for 201, Leeds for 107, Bristol for 93, Exeter for 52, and Newcastle for 35. In 1859 the number of bankruptcies gazetted was 943; in 1858, 1,353; in 1857, 1,429; in 1856, 1,197; in 1855, 1,411; in 1854, 1,214; in 1853, 756; in 1852, 822; and in 1851, 935,—showing an average on the ten years of 1,123, or 143 below last year's total. Of the excess last year 95 bankruptcies occurred in the metropolitan district, which had 473 in 1851, 399 in 1852, 422 in 1853, 629 in 1854, 656 in 1855, 569 in 1856, 664 in 1857, 563 in 1858, and 462 in 1859. The remainder of the excess last year, 48, came from the provincial districts, which figured for 462 in 1851, 423 in 1852, 334 in 1853, 585 in 1854, 755 in 1855, 628 in 1856, 765 in 1857, 790 in 1858, and 481 in 1859. Last year the Liverpool district was 8, the Manchester 25, and the Newcastle 1 below the average of the decade; while, on the other hand, the Birmingham was 45, the Leeds 2, the Bristol 25, and the Exeter 10 above the average. Every district, except the Liverpool (which was 5 below), showed an excess as compared with 1859, the increase being 14 in the Manchester, 50 in the Birmingham, 9 in the Leeds, 40 in the Bristol, 17 in the Exeter, and 17 in the Newcastle jurisdictions.

THE POST OFFICE.—It appears that in the year ending March 31, 1860, the postage collected by country postmasters amounted to 136,525*l.*, as compared with 159,122*l.* in 1858-9.

174,407*l.* in 1857-8, 177,658*l.* in 1856-7, and 201,087*l.* in 1855-6. The postage collected in the metropolis was 118,801*l.*, as compared with 142,158*l.* in 1858-9, 166,584*l.* in 1857-8, 170,813*l.* in 1856-7, and 173,069*l.* in 1855-6. The postage charged against public departments was 148,862*l.*, as compared with 132,706*l.* in 1858-9, 143,377*l.* in 1857-8, 145,419*l.* in 1856-7, and 172,152*l.* in 1855-6. The collections by postmasters and agents abroad amounted to 138,047*l.*, as compared with 145,348*l.* in 1858-9, 142,689*l.* in 1857-8, 132,772*l.* in 1856-7, and 76,432*l.* in 1855-6. The stamps charged to postmasters reached a total of 2,053,487*l.*, as compared with 1,934,217*l.* in 1858-9, 1,803,210*l.* in 1857-8, and 1,566,188*l.* in 1855-6. The stamps charged to the Inland Revenue Office were valued at 605,915*l.*, as compared with 554,642*l.* in 1858-9, 518,187*l.* in 1857-8, 497,960*l.* in 1855-6. The commission on money-orders realized 117,829*l.*, as compared with 107,212*l.* in 1858-9, 212,720*l.* in 1857-8, 104,079*l.* in 1856-7, and 100,575*l.* in 1855-6. The miscellaneous receipts were 12,139*l.*, as compared with 8,892*l.* in 1858-9, 12,656*l.* in 1857-8, 13,249*l.* in 1856-7, and 7,554*l.* in 1855-6. The gross receipts were 3,331,609*l.* in 1858-9, 3,061,403*l.* in 1857-8, 2,930,950*l.* in 1856-7, and 2,793,870*l.* in 1855-6; but these amounts were reduced, from the loss on returned, refused, or missent letters, to 3,310,655*l.* in 1858-9, 3,175,560*l.* in 1857-8, 3,038,112*l.* in 1856-7, 2,909,190*l.* in 1855-6, and 2,767,201*l.* in 1855-56.

THE JANUARY DIVIDENDS.—There are 130,589 individuals who, on the 9th of January, were entitled to receive, in the shape of interest, for money lent to the Government, the sum of £6,012,447, which represents half a year's interest on £400,829,818 of Three per Cent. Consols. Of this number of persons by far the greater portion are small holders of stock. For instance, there are 45,109 whose dividends do not exceed £5; 19,441 whose dividends do not exceed £10; and 42,726 whose dividends do not exceed £50. A large portion of the above-mentioned total is received by bankers on behalf of their customers, and on the day the bankers receive it they advise the parties that they have placed the amount to their credit; so that on the same day every stockholder in Great Britain will be aware that he may draw on his banker whenever he thinks proper. In addition to the interest thus to be paid to the national creditor there is also payable for dividends arising from investments in foreign stocks upwards of half a million. Including the dividends and interest on the Indian government and railway securities, also on colonial securities, and on railway debentures and stock, together with those receivable by the shareholders, consisting of many thousand individuals, in the various joint stock banks and other companies, the total sum coming upon the market from these sources in the present month and early in February, cannot be put at less than eleven or twelve millions.

"CASE FOR THE OPINION OF COUNSEL.

"This Company was formed for the purpose of granting Life Assurance Policies which should be absolutely Indisputable, and the following form of Policy has been adopted. (Copy Policy).

"The Opinion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Mr. J. NAPIER HIGGINS is requested.

"Whether a Policy in the above form would be Disputable by the Company upon any ground whatever, and if so, upon what ground."

"WE ARE OF OPINION THAT (assuming the Assured to have an Insurable Interest in the Life within the Provisions of 14 Geo. III., c. 48) A POLICY IN THE FORM STATED ABOVE WOULD BE INDISPUTABLE BY THE COMPANY, BOTH AT LAW AND IN EQUITY.

"RICHARD BETHELL, Attorney-General.

CURRENT TOPICS.

In reference to our observations of last week upon Lord Brougham's letter to the Secretary of the approaching Boston Conference, a correspondent calls our attention to a passage in the opinion delivered by his lordship to the House of Lords, in Fenton v. Livingstone (3 Macqueen, 538; 7 W. R. 671). The passage is as follows:—

Great reliance was placed on the respondent's part, and by some of the learned judges below, upon the position that status acquired in one country follows a person everywhere; it is said, "sicut umbra personam sequitur." Now, nothing can be more a case of status than liberty and slavery. Yet when a man from a country where he was by law held in slavery, comes to England or Scotland, the light of liberty chases away the shadow. He is in all respects free as regards his person, and as regards his property, though in the place he came from he was a mere chattel, and whatever he earned or became possessed of in any way while there belonged to his master; that master could not recover it in our courts, since the principles which were laid down in Somerset's case in England, and in Knight v. Wedderburn (Morr. 14,545), somewhat earlier, in Scotland.

The case of Knight v. Wedderburn was decided by the Court of Session in Scotland in 1778, and is, therefore, subsequent to the case of Somerset v. Stewart, which was decided in England in 1772. In Knight v. Wedderburn, moreover, the judgment is contained in three or four lines, being simply to the effect that the defendant could not, as a master, exercise the rights of a slave-owner over the defendant. Neither in the arguments of counsel, nor in the judgments delivered by the bench, is there anything approaching, either in meaning or expression, the well-known saying about the English (or Scotch) air being too pure for slavery, or that the touch of British soil makes free the slave. So that, with all respect to our correspondent, as far as we are at present informed, the authorship of these popular metaphors is, as we pointed out last week, attributable neither to any of the Scottish judges nor to Lord Mansfield, who has hitherto had the credit of it, but to Mr. Hargrave, who was counsel for the negro in Somerset v. Stewart, if not to the advocate of the Russian slave in the mythical case before the Star Chamber, to which we referred last week.

Since writing the foregoing we have received the following communication on the same question:—

The Scotch case to which Lord Brougham alluded in his letter to the Americans was Knight v. Wedderburn, which will be found reported in the "Dictionary of Decisions," vol. xxxiii. p. 14,545. This case was decided in 1778, Somerset's case having been decided in 1772. Lord Mansfield's judgment only went to this extent, that the negro was entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus when imprisoned by his master; but it did not determine the rights of the master in other respects. The Scotch judges held "that the dominion assumed over the negro under the law of Jamaica being unjust, could not be supported in this country to any extent; that, therefore, the defendant had no right to the negro's services for any space of time, nor to send him out of the country against his consent." In a note to the address delivered at Glasgow by Lord Brougham, before the Social Science Association, he says that the decree of a slave's fetters falling off the moment he touched British ground "was first decided by the courts of Scotland, in the case of Knight, a negro, in 1778. In Somerset's case, 1772, the courts of England had not laid down the rule generally, but only that a negro could not be carried out of the country by his master." Lord Brougham is quite correct in what he has stated; but it may certainly be contended that although Lord Mansfield's judgment did not in terms go to the extent of the Scotch judgment, yet it implied as much.

We do not agree with our correspondent when he says that there was any difference in the nature of the issue raised, or of the judgment pronounced in these two cases. Somerset v. Stewart was as much "a decree of a slave's fetters falling off," as Knight v. Wedderburn. Somerset's case was more than a decision that "a negro could not be carried out of the country by his master." It decided that he could not be a slave in the country; and Knight's case decided nothing more. The passage in Mr. Macqueen's Reports, quoted above, is conclusive that Lord Brougham, when delivering his opinion in Fenton v. Livingstone, was under the erroneous impression that Knight's case was decided in Scotland before Somerset's case in England.

Although much has been done of late years to make our legal system sensible and harmonious, it must be acknowledged that we have not yet arrived at perfection, and that much even of our recent legislation can hardly be considered as more than experimental. As the object of all trials of fact is to arrive at the truth, and as it is of great importance to the public as well as to suitors that truth should be arrived at, it might naturally be supposed that in the year 1861 we should have some wisely matured system of inquiry applicable to all tribunals, and that the rules regulating the search after truth would be substantially the same in all courts. Yet we know that the fact is far otherwise. It would seem as if human ingenuity had been taxed to the utmost to make differences where none should exist. For example, you go into a Nisi Prius court, and hear the counsel for the plaintiff open his case, examine his witnesses, and, if the defendant does not intend to call witnesses, again address the jury, after which the counsel for the defendant has his speech. If, on the other hand, the defendant does call witnesses, the plaintiff's counsel does not address the jury immediately after the examination of his witnesses, but waits until the defendant's counsel has opened the case for the defendant, examined his witnesses, and again addressed the jury, after which the plaintiff's counsel replies. That is one way of conducting an inquiry. When you go over into the Crown Court you find another. There, after the counsel for the prosecution has opened his case, he calls his witnesses, after which the counsel for the defence opens his case. If the latter calls no witnesses, the counsel for the prosecution has no second speech; if on the other hand he does call witnesses, the prosecuting counsel has a speech in reply, but the prisoner's counsel has no second speech. In the County Courts the rules on this subject are the same as in the criminal courts. Plaintiff's counsel opens; plaintiff's witnesses are examined: defendant's counsel opens; defendant's witnesses are examined: plaintiff's counsel replies; or, if defendant calls no witnesses, the plaintiff's counsel has no reply, and the forensic battle concludes with the speech of the defendant's counsel. But when we come to the trial of an information before justices at petty sessions, we find still another rule. There, after the prosecutor's counsel has opened the case, and called his witnesses, the defendant's counsel opens his case, and calls his witnesses, but even where he calls witnesses the prosecutor's counsel has no right of reply. Whatever doubts may exist as to the other rules to which we have adverted, there can be no doubt as to the impolicy of this, for it gives no opportunity to the prosecutor of remarking on the defence set up, while the defendant has the fullest opportunity of criticising his adversary's case. In Chancery, the entire system of taking evidence, and the modes adopted for arriving at the determination of facts, are widely different from those adopted in every common law court. It must be confessed, however, that it is much more easy to point out anomalies of this kind than to propose an adequate remedy for them. The County Court judges would by no means relish the proposal to give the advocates before them the same number of speeches as at Nisi Prius; but still it seems worthy of consideration whether in actions where above £20 is sought to be recovered, the County Courts ought not to adopt the practice of the superior courts. Probably it may be thought that where the sum in controversy is below that amount it would hardly be worth while to lengthen the enquiry, and that in such a case truth, like other valuable commodities, may be bought too dear. We are at a loss to understand why the same rule as to speeches of counsel should not be followed in the Crown courts and at Quarter Sessions, as is now adopted at Nisi Prius. Surely an inquiry which in its results may affect life or liberty is as important as one concerning the breach of a charter-party, and ought to be conducted with the utmost jealousy and vigilance. It is idle to talk of time being wasted which is devoted to such an enquiry; and as criminal trials have been much shortened, owing to the extensive powers of amendment given by modern statutes—which prevent time being wasted upon mere technicalities—the time so saved might well be given to a more searching inquiry into the facts and truth of the case. So far as summary convictions are concerned, we have no hesitation in saying that the prosecutor should be entitled to a reply where the defendant calls witnesses; and as inquiries of this nature frequently involve pecuniary penalties to a large amount, reputation, and personal liberty, it may well be doubted whether the same mode of procedure should not be adopted as at Nisi Prius. "The wisest justice on the banks of Trent" must sometimes arrive at unsatisfactory conclusions under the present system.

The Manchester Guardian of the 16th and 17th inst. contains several letters animadverting in the strongest terms upon the treatment of debtors in the gaol of that city. The governor has not yet been heard in his defence, but if one half of what is alleged in the letters be true, a state of things prevails in the Manchester gaol which is difficult to imagine as taking place in the nineteenth century. We trust that an inquiry of the most stringent character will be made into the matter; as if the statements of the Guardian's correspondents are untrue, they are scandalous libels upon a public functionary; but, if true, they ought at once to bring down upon the head of the governor condign disgrace and punishment.

On Friday, the 11th inst., Mr. Albert Turner, of the firm of Messrs. Sole Turner, & Turner, of Aldermanbury, attended as solicitor at Guildhall to prosecute one George Vernon Jackson, who was charged with fraud under the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act of 1849. By some absurd and unaccountable blunder, such as very rarely happens in the Times, in a leading article in that journal of Monday last, on the recent fraudulent bankruptcies, Mr. Turner was stated to be the fraudulent bankrupt. The error was acknowledged next day.

The Juridical Society will hold its next meeting on Monday, the 21st inst., at 8 o'clock, p.m., when a paper will be read by Mr. Lindley, "On some Errors in Legislation, illustrated by the Statutes relating to Joint Stock Companies."

TAXATION OF SUITORS.—No. III.

INCIDENCE OF TAXES IMPOSED ON SUITORS AS BETWEEN CONTENTIOUS AND ADMINISTRATIVE BUSINESS, AND AS BETWEEN SUITS ACCORDING TO THE PROPERTY AT STAKE.

Having in our last article considered the question how far the State, and how far the suitor, should provide for the maintenance of the judicial establishments, the subject proposed at the head of the present article will now be most conveniently taken. Our clients the suitors will have to pay largely; how ought the money to be raised? There is now levied on the man who calls to Chancery to administer an estate, say of £1,000, exactly the same contribution as if it was an estate of £100,000, or a million. This is a crying injustice. But more than this. The State has in its care, and guarantees and administers, some 200 or 300 millions of property. It has between 50 and 60 millions in the Bank of England, in the Accountant-General's name. That office costs for clerks and expenses £13,000 a-year, in addition to a salary of £4,200 to the Accountant-General, and £3,097, two-fifths of the brokerage retained by the broker. The suitors of the year paid, in 1859, a sum of £737 8s. 3d., only for fees at the Accountant-General's office. The rest of the cost of this establishment is, in fact, paid by the fees levied on the contentious business, i. e., just by that class of business which we showed last week, is the last which should be taxed. This is a still more grievous injustice. Does Parliament know all this? Yes. A House of Commons committee worked laboriously at this subject through the years 1847, 1848, and 1849, and reported in 1848 most accurately, as we conceive, the principle on which the tax on Chancery suitors should be assessed, viz., First, let the State pay as much as it will give for its quota. Secondly, use the banking profit as the next source. Thirdly, put a charge of half per cent. on the funds invested through the Accountant-General, and half per cent. on dividends paid through him. Fourthly, raise the rest by a tax on orders (the only operative, and to suitors, useful and useable articles the court manufactures, all else are raw material only). In 1849 the committee (in the face, we conceive, of threatened opposition) retracted its first views to this extent, that it recommended (why we cannot tell) the division of the fund to be provided by sources three and four into moieties; one moiety to be raised by per centage, the other by per capita taxation on suitors, (without reference to the sums at stake,) according to the theory then and still prevailing in the courts. Nothing was done upon these reports until 1852, when a Bill was brought in, prepared by the then Solicitor-General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Sir George Grey, and printed 6th Feb., 1852, No. 34; the 6th section of which contained a provision that the Lord Chancellor might by order,

"Substitute a per centage on all or any of the monies paid, or of the stock transferred, into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, or on the dividends paid out of the said Court in lieu of all or any of the fees now payable as aforesaid."

In the latter end of February, 1852, came a change of Government, when Mr. Walpole became Home Secretary, and took charge of the Bill: and, as he had formed one of two in a minority on a division in the committee on fees, the clause was altered at his instance; and in the print of the Bill, as amended in committee, the above-quoted words were struck out. We are not aware that any parliamentary debate, or even explanation, took place on the subject.

The committee, in their final report in 1849, (Par. P. 559, page v.) report as follows:—

"As regards the fees of those courts not under regulation, and the whole of the fees of courts of law generally, your committee's inquiries have been hitherto but limited; they, however, esteem the importance of this branch of the subject referred to them to be such as to require more extensive and searching investigation."

This was eleven years ago—a good slice of a man's life, and three generations of Chancery suits have since died away. But no systematic attention is bestowed by our Government on subjects of this nature, great as they are; and so little by the authorities of the Court, that to this day nothing has been done to work out this most important recommendation. More than that, the fee-stamp method of collection has been introduced with perfect success for several courts; but (as we shall have hereafter to mention again) on the reconstruction of the common law offices by the Act of 15 & 16 Viet. c. 73, (cited in the Report of 1860, on Concentration of the Courts of Justice, p. 59), the old (and as a method of levying a State tax infamous) system of collecting fees through some ninety hands without check or audit was continued.

The commission now about to be issued, will, of course, complete the inquiry left unfinished in 1849; and as the fees of the solicitors are fixed and assessed by the Court merely because they are officers of Court, and under the same authority and (with about equal thought and wisdom) with those on suitors, we trust that the commission will not close its labours till that part of the subject has also been investigated. To errors committed in fixing fees for solicitors, the committee of the House of Lords on the Masters' Primary Jurisdiction Bill are known to have agreed with Lord Brougham, their chairman, that a very large part of the evils in the administration of the law are attributable.

In common law cases it is much more easy to assess a tax on the suitor according to the amount at stake than in equity. To some extent these amounts are returned in the judicial statistics, but insufficiently. In passing let us remark that these returns are capable of great improvement; and that the proper requirements for them have yet to be thoroughly considered in the interest and on behalf of suitors. Officers must have sketched out the forms, for they show fully what the officers, &c., have done; but scarcely at all what they have left undone, and how much time they have occupied in the doing. That great curse of the law, the delay, is not probed by those forms at present in use. With reference to very many minor courts the old fee-pay system is still continued—e.g., for the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster. It seems to us that on no account should such a state of things be longer permitted. This, however, belongs to the next chapter of our present inquiry.

The true scientific principles on which the total to be raised by a state law tax should be assessed, as between suitor and suitor, of course, are the same as those on which ordinary state taxes should be assessed. As far as possible, it should be a property-tax; as little as possible, or never, a poll-tax. But the poll-tax principle prevails almost throughout the law, except in lunacy, where the whole tax is levied on the percentage principle: a system which has been fraught with the greatest benefit, and yet which, if right, then undeniably should be extended, at least, to all administration business.

In imposing a tax, too, as much as possible on money transactions, you place it where it is never felt or thought of: and to avoid as far as possible the "impatience of taxation" is no small point.

Again, the quantity of account-keeping the present system involves is absurd. All the State wants is a total of so many pounds sterling. Why collect it by shillings at a time?

"On the mere head of expense to the suitor (say the Commissioners of 1849) it will be seen that a solicitor's bill must be largely increased if he has to charge numerous attendances for the payment of fees, at different times and places."

The increase in the bill is here over-estimated; but the system of imposing heaps of little payments is utterly useless, and a great vexation and hindrance. The suitor repays them all in one payment, viz., in the bill of costs; and as a third to a half the bills of cost in Chancery essentially must come to a taxation for payment out of a trust fund, the continuance of the plan of numerous small taxes, instead of one large one, is wholly attributable, we conceive, to the vis inertiae of officials.

Altogether, we cannot doubt that a thorough inquiry into this subject must lead to many very wise, practical, and most beneficial changes; changes, too, which, unlike those in law or procedure, will save trouble to everybody and on all sides.

The answer to the question at the head of this article, is in our judgment sufficiently indicated by the report of the House of Commons of 1848 above referred to.

PROCEEDINGS IN CHANCERY "CHAMBERS."

By the Parliamentary returns of proceedings in the chambers of the judges of the Court of Chancery for the years ending respectively 1st November, 1859, and 1860, it appears that the number of summonses for administration of estates issued was nearly 100 more in the latter period than in the corresponding former one, which shows that the facilities offered by the Court for the speedy and economical administration of estates is not unappreciated. The indemnity which the Court gives is becoming better understood, and the comparatively inexpensive mode of proceeding, as contrasted with the former cumbrous machinery of the Court, must tend to induce many persons to avail themselves of the security thus afforded against outstanding claims and other liabilities. There are numberless cases in which executors or administrators will find it beneficial, and for their security, to avail themselves of the aid of the Court in the administration of the estate which devolves on them. The claims of creditors and their priority are decided for them, and after the usual advertisement for creditors, no further responsibility rests on the executor or administrator. His mind is relieved from all further anxiety as to any claim which may afterwards arise. But the security thus given does not seem to be taken advantage of to the extent which it might have been expected it would be, on the introduction of the present cheap and expeditious mode of procedure; for the entire number of summonses taken out in the two periods mentioned respectively is very small, being not greater than 332 and 420. It is presumed, however, that when it becomes more generally known that in the cases to which this proceeding is applicable (viz., administration of personal estate, and of real estate also where devised in trust for sale), a Chancery suit is a very short and simple affair, the administration summons will become generally resorted to.

The business of the Court might be still more simplified by giving further facilities for proceedings by summons, and there does not appear to be any reason why they should not be extended further as to cases under the Trustee Acts, and also it might be given in cases of investment and reinvestment and payment out of funds under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. There cannot be any reason why it should be necessary to go to the expense of a petition in all these cases any more than it is necessary to go through the formality of a bill and answer, for the administration of personal estate as in former times, a simple summons in lieu thereof being all that is required.

As regards the limited applications allowed under the Trustee Acts, the jurisdiction does not appear to be clearly defined. It is given by the 35th of the consolidated orders, article 4, when a decree or order has been made for sale or conveyance of any land, &c. It would appear there would be no jurisdiction at chambers given by this order in the case of a chose in action, or any other subject dealt with by the Trustee Acts.

There appears from the return to have been a diminution in the latter of the two periods compared with the former in the number of ordinary summonses, in the number of advertisements issued, in the number of debts proved, in the number of accounts other than Receiver's accounts, in the sales and purchases under orders of Court, in the certificates filed, and in the amount of fees paid, but not of such an amount as to justify any conclusion as to the average business of the court. In the cases of stamps for fees the decrease is accounted for by the fact of per centage on receivers' accounts being now assessed on the net receipts, and not on the gross amount as formerly; and the decrease in the number of advertisements probably arises from the operation of Lord St. Leonards' Act giving executors power to advertise.

In numerous cases in the progress of a suit where petitions are now necessary, the jurisdiction by summons might also be extended, for instance where a fund is to be got out of court. The benefit of an extended jurisdiction at chambers in such cases would be great. In applications under the Act for payment of legacies into court, and under the Trustee Relief Act, a great hardship is imposed on the tenant for life in many cases by the necessity of a petition when the trust fund exceeds £300. The cost of the application in numerous cases swallows up the first year's income. The jurisdiction by summons ought to be considerably extended in these cases. The usefulness of the Court would thus be most materially increased, and the public would have more confidence in its working, and less fear on account of its cost.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

In the present conflict of opinion upon the question of registration, whether of assurances or of title, the Act consolidating the laws relating to real property in South Australia, upon which we commented in our last number, possesses peculiar interest and importance. It is a gift of art to science, being an application of the experience in the registration of shipping acquired by Mr. Torrens, its author, to the principles propounded by the commissioners on Registration of Title, in accordance with which the real property Bills of Sir Hugh Cairns were framed.

The Australian Act professes to have provided "efficacious, simple, and economical machinery for carrying those principles into practical operation." This claim to our favour is supported by the successful working of similar enactments in Australia during the last two years. These enactments the recent Act consolidates, and we now resume our review of it. A careful study of it will help us to discriminate with precision between the unreal attractions of registration as at present lauded by an influential class of legal economists, and the really useful purposes which a system based upon conservative principles, and worked by simple machinery, may be made to subserve. Now whatever may be the opinions or wishes of the profession upon the subject, the Manchester economists appear determined to have some system of registration established by law. Registration of evidence of title will, probably, be the compromise that the Legislature will ultimately make between the bold suggestions of royal commissioners, the echoes of the popular cry, and the mistrust which a large portion of the professional public are expressing as to the expediency of such systems.

The 81st section of the Act which we are discussing enacts that the grant of fresh certificates of title, upon the devolution of estates by death, insolvency, &c., does not affect any trusts attaching to the land. The new proprietor, however, has unlimited power of disposition over the land for the purposes of sale or mortgage. Sales of land brought under the operation of this Act will be inoperative to pass any interest to the purchaser, unless the writ or process of execution shall have been previously registered. The donee of a power of attorney to sell may obtain a certificate of title in the name of his principal. The 88th section provides for this, which was a casus omnisus, and opens the way to a system of land brokerage, than which few institutions can be more useful to a colony having an abundant supply of good land, and desirous of facilitating trade in it. Upon surrender of different certificates, a proprietor can obtain one certificate for the aggregate of lands comprised in the former. A registered vendor, plaintiff in a suit for specific performance, is entitled, upon production of his certificate, to a decree against a party who may have contracted for a purchase. This section, of course, does not dispense with proof necessary to show that the contract itself is, in all other respects, unimpeachable. No vendor is to have an equitable lien upon the land for any balance of unpaid purchase-money. The Act, we think, would have been more judiciously framed, if it directed the total extinction of trusts, express, implied, constructive, or resulting, as to purchasers, mortgagees, &c., rather than have prohibited, by an isolated section, a single class of trusts such as those mentioned; inasmuch as the exception may possibly be urged in some future argument as indicating an intention on the part of the Legislature not to demolish the whole species of trusts specifically attaching to land. This, indeed, the Act implicitly does, and, therefore, further special provisions to the same effect are superfluous and embarrassing. No agreement for a dealing with land in futuro is to be registered except in the case of a right of purchase granted to a lessee in a lease, or a covenant to purchase entered into by the lessee. Damages may be recovered in an action at law against any person lodging a caveat without reasonable cause. The giving to the Registrar-General or the judge, when adjudicating upon the caveat, power to award a pecuniary mulct, together with costs, to the party sought to be injured, would, we think, be an improvement in the Act; inasmuch as the reasonable cause is likely to depend upon the construction of written documents, which, being a matter for judicial consideration, could be most conveniently determined upon the general adjudication on the merits of the caveat. This mode of procedure as to caveats would be also most in keeping with the policy of the Act; which studiously seeks to facilitate sales without regard to trusts or obscure rights. A malicious or speculating caveator would be more deterred by the proximity of the punishment, than by its final certainty. Powers of attorney, when registered, are conclusive evidence of the authority of the donee of the power, and of his right to deal with the land, as if he were a principal. A registration abstract is issued by the registrar to proprietors to enable them to sell, mortgage, &c., the land without the limits of the province. The issue of such an abstract is noted on the register as also on the certificate of title, and such a notification, until cancelled, suspends all registration of dealings with the land to which the abstract refers. A memorandum of transfer, mortgage, lease, &c., concluded without the limits of the province, is then notified by memorial upon the abstract, in presence of, and authenticated by, any of the persons authorized by the Act to superintend transactions outside the province. This is equivalent to plenary registration; the registration abstract being, as it were, a moveable part of the register. The consent of a third party, when necessary to a conveyance, may be given by the endorsement upon the memorandum of transfer of the words, "I consent hereto." A substitute for a person under disability may be appointed by any court or judge having jurisdiction over the property concerned. Attestation by one witness is sufficient for instruments executed pursuant to the provisions of the Act. If a certificate be lost, a provisional certificate will be issued in its stead, and an entry made on the register of the issue of the provisional certificate. All future public maps are directed to be made in duplicate, in order that one may be lodged in the register office. A map must also be deposited by any proprietor who subdivides his land so as to form a township. The map should delineate the squares, roads, &c. A general search can be made in the registry office, on payment of a fee of 5s.; a limited search, on payment of 2s. 6d. Certified copies of all instruments on record are issued at a small charge, and such certified copies, which are authenticated by the signature and seal of the Registrar-General, are as effectual in evidence as the originals. In cases where a fraudulent proprietor shall have been dead, or have absconded, the Registrar-General may be made a nominal defendant, for the purpose of recovering damages out of the Assurance Fund. If a fraudulent proprietor refuse to surrender his certificate, after order made to that effect, the Registrar-General may issue a fresh one to the lawful proprietor, after having noted on the register the circumstances under which the additional certificate was issued. Married women transfer their estates by a registration of the fact of marriage, and by a deed acknowledged in the manner prescribed by the Act. The executor or administrator of a mortgagor is registered as owner of the mortgage, upon production to the Registrar-General of the probate or letters of administration upon which the application is based. All instruments submitted for registration must be endorsed with a declaration that they are "correct for the purposes of the Act," a false averment of which is punishable by a fine of fifty pounds. This correctness merely means, we presume, a conformity to the conditions and forms prescribed by the Act, and not as to the inherent bona fides of the application. The falsification of the register or of certificates is constituted a felony, punishable by imprisonment for a period not exceeding four years.

The index to the register is compiled according to the alphabetical order of the names of the proprietors. As every instrument relating to the land, however, is marked with the number of the volume and folio of the register-book, which consists of the original grants or certificates bound together as we described ante p. 177, a search of the index is unnecessary, except for heirs or creditors who may desire to learn the aggregate of the lands owned by the proprietor of a certain lot. Such a search is unnecessary for transfers, incumbrances, &c. The instruments themselves are exhibited if the memorials be not considered by the searcher to convey adequate information. This purpose, however, does not seem to us important enough to recommend such cumbrous deposits. Information derived from any source outside the register is useless, except as to description of boundaries. But even original deeds cannot be considered as containing certain evidence of boundaries, inasmuch as this is a matter to be ascertained chiefly by local observation. These deposits, then, appear to be merely so much adipose matter, impeding the activity of the system.

The transactions under the Act for the twelvemonth ending 30th June, 1859, were less than those for the subsequent twelvemonth by 154½ per cent. Mr. Torrens remarks that the defects in titles are generally only technical. The applications for certificates of title were, for the first mentioned twelvemonth, 459; for the latter twelvemonth, 1092. Of the total of applications, only two were rejected, and thirteen withdrawn. The value of the land brought under the Act was, in the former twelvemonth, £326,977 13s.; in the latter twelvemonth, £635,184 7s. The amount secured by mortgage was, in the former period, £23,248 10s.; in the latter, £118,872 4s. 9d. The fees received in the former period were, £1,659 1s. 9½d.; in the latter, £4,028 4s. 4½d. The chief object of the Act, the subject of these observations, is to remove certain doubts that hung about the nature of the indefeasibility of title conferred by a certificate under the former Act. A similar doubt, which prevailed in Ireland respecting the extent to which a parliamentary title operated, was removed without legislative interference by the case of Rorke v. Errington, 7 H. of L. Cas. 617, in which it was decided that a parliamentary title left no lease or charge unextinguished. The chief impediments to the working of the Act are owing, as stated by Mr. Torrens, to the confusion of boundaries, and also to the hostility of the profession, which we believe is general, and not altogether without cause, as the Act has had the effect of calling into existence a class of pests who, although not professional men, do the work of solicitors, both badly and expensively.

Besides the system of registration that we have described three other methods, likewise appointed by statute, are also used, viz., by memorial, by enrolment, and by deposit of the original instruments. The average of registered instruments for the last three years was for these systems in the order mentioned, respectively, 6,550, 368, and 528. But a memorial, Mr. Torrens suggests, may not contain the material facts stated in the deed, and, consequently, although it is admissible in evidence, in substitution of a lost deed, this admissibility is valueless. Moreover, as Mr. Torrens adds, A may sell to B; B, without registering, may sell to C, who registers. A may again sell to D, who registers, and who could not have learnt from the deeds before him, nor from the index which is compiled, according to the alphabetical order of the names of the grantors, anything whatever of the conveyance to C. Now C was guilty of negligence in not having compelled B to register, and C, therefore, should lose the estate; and although D was equally culpable in not having compelled A, his own grantor, to register, yet he is prior in legal time, or in the order of the devolution of title, to C, and is, therefore, paramount in law. But this can but seldom occur in a register country; no prudent purchaser would take a conveyance from A without seeing the state on the register both of A's and his predecessor's title.

Registration by memorial is the only system that is likely to be ever established in England. Registration of title, as a means of transfer, is incompatible with the present security of family settlements. Enrolment of deeds is physically impossible—Roma suo molimine ruit. What area would suffice for such lumber? The chief defect of registration is, that it is a ceremony which comes after the contract, and is therefore likely to be very frequently omitted. This natural drawback would be greatly obviated by a system of local registries; but, then, local registries would not place land in the desired contact with the metropolitan loan market. Registration is, as it were, a legal currency, which the inconsiderate think can be made not only to circulate, but almost to create, title and landed capital. Nevertheless, registration has its uses. As the report of 1850 observes, the use of documentary evidence is imperfect unless complete, and this completeness registration can alone confer, by invalidating all instruments which are not registered. Thus the primary object and proper use of a register is to limit searches, and, as a consequence, to determine priorities; the register for this latter purpose operating as notice to all. It can, doubtless, be constituted a mode of conveyancing, or even the only one, as it is in South Australia. But that is to render it subversive of the important class of equitable rights. As to the notoriety of registration, we consider it useful, as discouraging secret loans and speculations. The desire of secrecy, which originated trusts and long terms, sprang from an effort to evade the feudal burthens; but secrecy itself can only have the tendency of rendering title obscure and complicated. Sir Hugh Cairns' Bill intended to provide for mortgagors desiring secrecy by caveats, which were to reveal nothing in particular, but which were to serve as "notice to persons about to deal with the land that the caveator had an interest in it." A caveat of this nature would be the reverse of a secret mortgage. It would be a publication of it with a trumpet, and would, as it were, say to all subsequent lenders, hic niger est; hunc tu Romane caveo. The amount would probably be much exaggerated in the conjectures of those who saw the caveat—omne ignotum pro mirifico. As to the secrecy of registration, then, we can only say it is unknown to such systems. A register must be concise, in short—a mere index. The commissioners of 1850 recommended the depositing of the title deeds in the register. We do not. Cui bono, even if it were practicable in England, which it is yet for Australia. The commissioners of 1856 recommended a system of registration founded upon ownership. We consider such extended views of the purposes which a system of registration can fulfil, hardly warranted. Registration tends to prevent false, forged, and secret deeds, and to supply the place of lost ones, to abridge conveyancing, to limit searches, and to disclose with certainty the amount in money of incumbrances, however indefinite the parties or classes are who may be entitled to receive those amounts. Registration, therefore, clearly shows the value of the interest of the proprietor as a basis for further loans. But registration cannot alter the law; it is merely administrative; it may suggest amendments, but it can never fully realize the expectations of its enthusiastic advocates. Nor can any law enable a landowner to have his estate freely circulating in the market, and, at the same time, irretrievably charged with the maintenance of his wife and children. If land ceased to be capable of being thus charged, and to be followed as the security for the charges, it would fall considerably in value, contrary to the present impressions of the advocates of a free trade in land. The present law of trusts, however, does not in the least impede a sale, when such is necessary, as the decree for sale may be at present pronounced before the priorities of incumbrancers are determined, the purchase-money being paid into court to the credit of the cause. That incumbrances may also be readily created upon landed security at present is shown by the low rate of interest which such security offers. Surely the public do not desire frequent sales of unincumbered land, as if it could, like its produce, be retailed at a profit. Registration without a concomitant enactment, authorising the creation of parliamentary titles, would not to any considerable extent facilitate the deduction of title for at least the next twenty years. The remoteness of the advantage, however, is not a conclusive objection to the establishment of such a system, although it shows the extravagance of the views of its extreme advocates.

Mr. Torrens quotes the report of the commissioners on registration of title, stating the object of their inquiry to be "by what means, consistently with the preservation of existing rights, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as title is concerned, and the difference in the nature of the subject matter may allow, as they can deal with moveable chattels or stock. This," says Mr. Torrens, "is no longer a problem for solution; it is a realised fact." Land certainly presents no more specific impediments to a legal transfer, than stock, ships, railway, or mining shares do. If unlimited powers of sale, with proper provisos, were continued for a period of sixty years, land at the end of that time would have a title consisting only of the links of descent through the trustees, or their appointees under the powers, and be free for purposes of sale from all complication of trusts. Land is not in its own nature, though it is in law, more specific than personal property, and admits as readily of a reduction to the common denomination of value—money.

But the true obstacle to the transfer of land being rendered as easy as that of stock or shares, is that land is charged with trusts, and that other descriptions of property are not so chargeable, at least, with the same security to the cestuique trusts. Land has thus to bear well nigh the whole weight of trusts, which, if banking and other companies permitted voluminous records in their books, and the law affected the purchasers of stock with notice of such, would be partly distributed among stock and shares. If land, then, be assimilated to personalty in its exemption from trusts, nothing remains for family settlements to operate upon,—an alternative not of consequence in South Australia, but the very foundation of English homes. The fact of conveyancing by bookkeeping has, therefore, been very easy for Mr. Torrens to realize, since the 74th section of the Act we have been discussing prohibits the registration of trusts. When South Australia becomes the emporium of commerce and of stock, ships, and shares, the citizens of Melbourne will, doubtless, prefer, as we do at present, a certain degree of fixity of tenure for the youthful occupants of the fireside, leaving speculation to gambol, as it may, upon the Stock Exchange. Let us consider this view of the case attentively, and in the different aspects it presents in Australia and in England.

Land is always bought either with a view to its resale at a profit, like any other article of commerce, or to be retained by the proprietor for his own use, or for the benefit of his family. In Australia, and all other new colonies, if the system of conveyancing there suits the requirements of trade, the most necessary object is accomplished. The cultivation of large unappropriated tracts of land, and the improvement of the lands under cultivation, are some of the main objects which a wise colonial government should sedulously endeavour to promote. For these purposes, the deduction and transfer of title must be free from uncertainty and heavy expense; otherwise, capital will be diverted from agriculture, the very species of investment which constitutes the special advantage of a new country, and which is potent enough to attract immigrants in despite of the ties of home. To have colonial land well cultivated, the title, like the soil itself, must be freed from all entanglement, and for this purpose, trusts and family settlements must be regarded as of very subordinate consideration. The Australian law of real property is, therefore, suited on the whole to that country, which may be advanced materially, and even socially, better by means of a progressive agriculture than by any system, however perfect, of trusts, which, indeed, would have little to attach upon, if capital was repelled from the land by a vicious state of the law. In old countries, however, there cannot be a progressive agriculture. Land in England has been long brought almost to the acme of cultivation. If £100 were expended within the year upon any single acre in Middlesex, it would not produce a profit equal to a per centage from the funds. However, while land with us is not much used in commerce, it is the great basis upon which family settlements are constructed. The doctrine of notice, and the Statute of Limitations, are the most efficient means recognized by the law for protecting the trusts of settlements; and a system of parliamentary titles, which would necessarily destroy these the legal safeguards of trusts, would no doubt be attended with many difficulties and disadvantages of a serious character.

To conclude, the Australian system of registration exemplifies as we have stated, the combined operation of two principles that in Ireland are separately applied, viz., parliamentary title and registration. A parliamentary title confers upon an estate a freedom from all previous claims; just as a certificate of bankruptcy confers upon its holder a like immunity. It is equivalent to the repeal of all statutes of limitation according to the discretion of the judge in each case, and also involves the abolition of the doctrine of notice, a doctrine much more unduly depreciated than extolled. These effects may possibly be excuplated, but they cannot be denied. Registration has not, necessarily, any of these effects. Of its own nature it tends rather to perpetuate than destroy claims. Nor, where the necessities of trade do not require it, do we see any use in frequent extinguishments of just claims and charges, which do not encroach upon the rule against perpetuities in their creation, nor against the Statute of Limitations at the period at which they are sought to be enforced. A sound and concise system of registration would be still more useful to the capitalist who is desirous to lend, than to him who wishes to purchase. In the former case, the lender need only subtract the total amount of all incumbrances on record from the value of the estate, to ascertain the margin of investment. The purchaser has to do more—he has to ascertain the parties legally entitled to receive the respective charges; otherwise he may be compelled to pay the same sum twice over. This observation is borne out by the facility with which land was incumbered, as also by the difficulties which impeded its sale, in Ireland, prior to the establishment of the Incumbered Estates Court. These difficulties occasioned great delay in the Irish Court of Chancery, as the rules of the Court at that time required that the priorities of all incumbrancers should be adjusted before a sale could be ordered by the Court. Private transfers were of course effected, if not with greater delay, at all events with proportionate risk. A sound and well-digested system of registration, then, as distinguished from the principles involved in parliamentary titles, has strong claims to be considered a main requirement of the legal system of a country such as England, which desires a cheap mode of creating incumbrances, but does not seek a general change of proprietary, nor consider a brisk trade in land to be paramount to the claims of minors; and also to that social stability which family settlements of land give to the most influential class in the State.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

VI.

COMPULSORY DOMICIL.

Domicil, generally speaking, is entirely constituted by the will of the party, influenced, of course, by circumstances; but there are several kinds of domicil in which the will of the individual takes no part, and these are known in our law as necessary domicils, but I think would be much more properly expressed by the word "compulsory," or perhaps, in a more general sense, as "involuntary." Thus all persons, who have not, legally speaking, an independent existence, come within this category, and follow the domicil of those who are, for the time, the ruling power, to whom they are appendant, and whose legal rights regulate and control those who are dependant upon them. This applies to individuals as well as to states, for a wife has as little legal power alone and without her husband as a prisoner has, independently of the Government by whom he is held in a state of captivity; and an infant can no more be legally responsible, or act in a manner that shall be binding upon himself, and upon those with whom he contracts, than an exile can return to the country from whence he is banished and regain the rights of a subject, whilst his sentence of banishment continues unrevoked. A minor is incapable during his minority of changing his domicil; but if his parents acquire a new domicil, that of the minor follows theirs; and therefore both these domicils are, so far as the minor is concerned, compulsory; if the parent dies, leaving an infant child who also dies under age, there can be no doubt upon this principle, that whatever actual changes of residence may have taken place in the case of the minor, the last domicil of the parent still continues his, and is his, in respect to whatever property he may leave behind him.

A married woman follows the domicil of her husband, and during coverture, is likewise, I apprehend, unable to acquire a new domicil, independent of him, however she may actually remove from place to place; and therefore supposing that both husband and wife should die at the same moment, the domicil of the husband at that instant would be the domicil of both; Warrender v. Warrender, 3 Bligh. 89, 103-4; but the residence of the wife will sometimes fix the domicil of the husband.

A natural child follows the domicil of its mother, ejus qui justum patrem non habet prima origo a matre. Pothier Pand. lib. 50, tit. 1, n. 3. It has been held by the American courts, not only that a minor having the domicil (there called settlement, but in this instance meaning the same thing) of its deceased father, does not lose it, but does not gain the settlement of the mother, even if she should acquire a new one by a second marriage; and this is another proof, if one were wanting, of the compulsory nature of an infant's domicil; Winthrop v. The Inhabitants of Waltham, Cush. 8, 327; but see contra, Arnott v. Groom, 9 Dec. of Court of Sess. 2 Ser. 142. In the American case it is supposed that there may arise such a state of circumstances, as that a person may have no settlement, as it is there called; but supposing that could be so with respect to a settlement according to the American law, it is very difficult to suppose that it could be so in regard to a domicil according to our law, for I consider it scarcely to be in the nature of things, according to the present state of the law, that a man should be without a domicil. The way in which the matter is treated is this: It is said that a legitimate child takes and follows the settlement of its father, if he has one; but, if he has none, then the settlement of the mother. It is the more difficult to suppose that a person may have no domicil; because it is also quite inconsistent with the general rule in this particular as to father and child, for a child always follows the domicil of the father, and the father, if he gain no other, must have a domicil originis aut nativitatis, which the child would follow, and therefore neither father nor child can be without a domicil.

The French law draws a distinction between birth and domicil, when it declares in the 76th article of the Code, that, "In the act of marriage shall be set forth the Christian names, profession, place of birth, and domicil of the married persons." But this is not inconsistent with the existence of a domicil of birth, which is a kind of pis aller, and may, through unnumbered changes of condition, be at last the only resort. In fact, this article of the Code refers probably to the presumption that when parties are of age to contract a marriage, one or both has gained a domicil for himself or herself quite independent of the domicilium originis aut nativitatis. The French law as to birth is very similar to our modern law, requiring a register to be entered of the fact, with the names of the parents, &c., and if the birth take place on board of ship, the entry is made immediately it arrives in port, with the domicile of the parents, and this word occurs in almost every article relating to this subject; although I must admit it has a wider signification than with us. There is the same thing with respect to marriage; and the distinction is constantly preserved between domicile and birth. In the 79th article of the Code Civile it is provided that the act (or registry) of death shall contain, as far as can be ascertained, the Christian names, surnames, profession, and domicile of the father and mother of the deceased, and the place of birth. Now from these examples it appears evident that the word "domicil," although used, no doubt, in the French in the same sense as in the English language, has still in France also a much more general signification, and means literally a mere place of residence; but in the 81st article the word is used in the more limited meaning; for it is there declared that where a person shall die by a violent death, all possible information shall be obtained of the age, profession, place of birth, and domicile of the deceased; whereas, in the other articles of the Code the domicile of the parents is referred to, and not of the child.

A singular, and, as it was considered by the judges who decided it, a most difficult case was brought before the Scotch courts upon the subject of the domicile of a minor which I shall here consider. It is the case of Arnott v. Groom, 9 Dec. of Court of Session, 2nd series, p. 142, referred to above. The facts were these: Jane Stewart was born in India, her father (a Scotchman by birth) having died in India in the service of the East India Company. On her father's death her mother brought her (in her infancy) to Scotland, and they resided in that country for fourteen years. Being at this time fifteen years old she went with her mother to the continent, where she resided for two years. She then returned to Scotland, remained there for two months, then went to England, where she lived for three years, and then died there, having attained her majority, and being engaged to be married to a merchant of Bristol. After she left Scotland the first time, she never had any permanent residence, but resided in furnished lodgings and at hotels, and sometimes with friends; but when on the continent and in England her mother retained undisposed of the furniture which she had in her house in Scotland. Under these circumstances it was held that she had gained a Scotch domicile, before leaving that country for the first time (after residing there for fourteen years), and that this domicile remained her domicile to her death, and had never been lost by the acquisition of a new one, animo et facto in England, notwithstanding her residence there, and notwithstanding that she was under an engagement to be married to a gentleman resident in England a considerable time before she died. The Lord Ordinary's judgment has a note appended to it, in which he observes that, "Miss Stewart never had any residence separate from her mother, who was domiciled in Scotland, and left her furniture there when she went elsewhere. Had she died in pupillarity (under age), and before she was capable of exercising the right of choosing a place of residence, her mother's domicile must have been hers. She did not choose to live apart from her mother, and had she died in June or July, 1839, (having actually died in 1841), her domicile clearly would have been Scotch. A domicile once fixed cannot be lost until a new and different one be acquired animo et facto, and no such domicile was acquired by mere living in England. It was said that she was engaged to be married, and therefore it must be assumed that her intention was, when married, to reside permanently in England; but until actual marriage, when the domicile of the wife merges in that of the husband, there seemed no authority for holding that a mere promise to marry could alter the domicile, whatever probable effect it might have on the future prospects of the party. Burge, on "Foreign and Colonial Law," 1—35. It is a settled rule that the intention to change a domicile is never to be presumed. "Pothier's Introduc. aux Coutumes," §§ 9 & 15; and Lord Fullerton observed that, "it was true India was her domicile of origin, but her only home was that of her mother, and as her mother's domicile was Scotch so was hers." In considering the question of the domicile of a minor, the case either of both parents being alive, or of an illegitimate child has been considered, in the one case, the minor following the father's domicile, in the other the mother's; but in the case just referred to, neither of those elements was to be found, and it was acknowledged that much difficulty was thereby created. The minor born in wedlock has that domicile which is that of its father at the time of its birth; it is therefore at once the domicilium patris originis aut natiuitatis, and there can be no doubt that, if both parents died durante minoritate, that domicile would remain the domicile of the minor until he or she attained his or her majority. If one parent survived, supposing that parent to be the father, no question would arise, because he has an independent domicile; and though he may constantly change it, yet it is within his own absolute control to do so; but suppose he pre-deceases his wife, her domicile, which was before compulsory, or not of choice, becomes at once independent, and she can acquire a new one, and in that respect, as a feme sole, stands in precisely the same position as a man. The only question then which could arise in a case like that of Arnott v. Groom, was, whether the minor once having acquired a domicile originis et patris, could lose that domicile, durante minoritate, by the change of the domicile of the surviving parent, it being certain that either parent who survives has the power of acquiring a new domicile. It was held, as we have seen, that such loss could occur, thereby laying down the rule that a minor can have two domiciles in succession, one of each parent, irrespective of the question of following the changes of domicile of each, which is a part of the ordinary law pertaining to the condition of minority. In the absence of authority it would certainly have been a bold thing for any text writer to lay down such a rule; but being laid down, I think it is very consonant with common sense and equity, having regard to the general principles governing this branch of British law.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

Jan. 15.—A committee of the Privy Council sat to day in the Council Chamber to consider petitions against the ordinances issued on the 6th of August, 1859, and the 19th of March, 1860, by the Scottish Universities Commissioners, with reference to degrees in Medicine and Surgery in the University of Edinburgh from the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons of Glasgow, and the Royal College of Surgeons of England.

Also a petition from the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh in support of their rights and in opposition to the arguments of the Medical Corporations on the matter of the Ordinances of the Universities (Scotland) Commissioners of the 6th of August, 1859, and the 19th of March, 1860.

The Lords present were the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of St. German's, Secretary Sir George C. Lewis, Lord Cranworth, the Duke of Richmond, and the Right Hon. R. Lowe.

The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General were in attendance as assessors.

Mr. R. Palmer was heard by their lordships, and was followed by Sir H. Cairns.

Jan. 17.—Mr. Rolt, Q.C., was heard for the Senatus Academicus of the University of Edinburgh.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR and the LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.)

Jan. 14.—Cook v. Sturgis.—This case came before the Court in the early part of last year on a motion for an attachment against Mr. Commissioner Law, of the Insolvent Court, for infringement of a writ of prohibition granted by Lord Chancellor Cranworth. The question turns upon the right of the Insolvent Court to direct the distribution of the surplus of an insolvent debtor's estate among his creditors under a second insolvency, notwithstanding that the Court of Chancery has held that Cook, the plaintiff in this suit, is entitled to such surplus as a purchaser for value. The fund is in the Insolvent Court. The prohibition inhibits Mr. Commissioner Law from distributing the money except upon the footing of Mr. Cook's deed; and the attachment asked for last year was in consequence of an order made by the Commissioner for dividing the fund among the insolvent's second set of creditors. This order was rescinded by the Commissioner and no attachment was issued.

Mr. Commissioner Law appeared this morning in person, and asked for a day to be named for the hearing of a motion to be made by him for having the writ of prohibition set aside, which writ, he stated, had obstructed him in the performance of his judicial duty for a period of four years.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.)

Jan. 16.—Draper v. the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincoln Railway Company.—This case came on by way of appeal from a decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, which involves an important question on the practice of the Court—namely, whether, when the common order is made for inspection of books by a party, his solicitor and agents, the party in whose favour the order is made is entitled to employ a professional accountant as one of the agents. Vice-Chancellor Stuart decided in the affirmative (ante, p. 87) and this was an appeal from that judgment.

Their LORDSHIPS, without disposing of the general question were of opinion that the accountant who had been appointed in this particular case was a gentleman who ought not to have been selected, and therefore that the order of the Vice-Chancellor must be discharged.

COMMON PLEAS.

(Sittings at Nisi Prius, at Westminster, before Mr. Justice BYLES and Common Juries.)

Jan. 14.—Goodman v. Arden.—The plaintiff, a house-agent, sought in this action to recover commission on the letting of a house and the sale of furniture in Lancaster-terrace, Regent's Park. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant to let several of his houses. The one in question was eventually let, and certain furniture in it sold to the tenant. The defendant was willing to pay the plaintiff's commission for the letting of the house, but not his claim in respect of the sale of the furniture, with which he said, the plaintiff had nothing to do. The whole question, therefore, was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to commission on the sale of the furniture.

Mr. Collier, in his address to the jury for the defendant, observed that if house-agents were entitled to charge after the rate claimed by the plaintiff, he (Mr. Collier) and many other gentlemen would do well to adopt that profession.

Mr. Serjeant Stee, in his reply, drew a ludicrous picture of the career of a barrister as contrasted with that of a house-agent. "Most of us," said he,—"at all events, I did—begin by taking a small room in the Temple, and half a clerk. As I got on I was advanced to the dignity of a whole boy—a very small one—whom his mother kindly permitted to attend on me for a very small salary. Eventually, it is true, I incurred greater expenses as I gained more fees; but a house-agent has to begin with an expensive establishment, and the difference between his business and that of a barrister is too manifest to admit of argument."

The learned JUDGE having summed up, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Jan. 17.—Stewart v. Birch.—The plaintiff in this case was a Miss Stewart, who sued the defendant, Dr. Birch, to recover damages, and both parties appeared in person. Miss Stewart was about to address the jury, when Mr. Justice Byles interrupted her by saying that the record was a very singular one, and he could not understand it; the best way would probably be to have it read.

The extraordinary document began as follows:—"I, Ann Anna Marie Stewart Stewart (of Stewart), late of 9, Ann's-place, Sloane-street, Chelsea, S.W., plaintiff, sue Scholes Butler Birch, the defendant, of Kensington-gore Lodge, and 217, Piccadilly (in the parish of Chelsea); who has been summoned to answer me, and to enter an appearance within eight days at the office of the Court of Common Pleas, Chancery-lane, for that the defendant heretofore, to wit, on the 23rd day of Sept., 1860 (and may be previously) did publish of and concerning the plaintiff that she was 'bastardie maniacal,' being a false and scandalous libel, the defendant having addressed the plaintiff as 'illegitimate' re and issued judgment; the above organised and acted out against the plaintiff, who has suffered special damage as follows:—The special damage was alleged in this way. Administratrix of three wills of plaintiff's father's, mother's, and uncles, having suffered under leaving and leaving, and leaving, three lodging-houses ejected from by defendant's medical orders."

The defendant denied the charge. Miss Stewart addressed the court, but her statements were exceedingly unconnected.

Mr. Justice BYLES said as far as he could understand, Dr. Birch was charged with having published a libel, but there was no writing. The best thing was for the plaintiff to be consulted.

This course was ultimately adopted.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings in Banco, before the LORD CHIEF BARON, Mr. Baron MARTIN, Mr. Baron CHANNELL, and Mr. Baron WILDE.)

Jan. 12.—Read v. Storey.—This case came before the Court last term in the shape of an appeal against the conviction of justices under the 3rd & 4th Vict. c. 61, relating to the sale of beer. The case is one of considerable public importance from the fact that for nearly 40 years beer has been sold in almost every village throughout the country at 1½d. a quart without a beer licence, with the sanction of the Excise, who were acting under an order of the Lords of the Treasury. The defendant relied upon the 12th section of the Act, under which he alleged he was at liberty to sell beer at 1½d. a quart without a licence. The Lord Chief Baron in delivering judgment said the case was clearly within the 13th section of the Act, namely, that the defendant had sold beer without a licence for so doing. That enactment was plain, and no exception ought to be implied to it without strong reasons, and the Court could see none. The conviction was right, and ought to be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

(Before Sir CRESSWELL CRESSWELL.)

Jan. 16.—Gurney v. Gurney.—In this case two petitions had been presented, one for a dissolution of the marriage, and another praying for a settlement of a portion of the respondent's property upon the children of the marriage.

Dr. Waddilove moved for his lordship's directions as to the manner in which the petition relating to the property should be heard.

His LORDSHIP said he could not order a case to be set down for trial which might never be in a condition to be tried. He could not assume that the petitioner would be able to establish his original petition. It was very inconvenient to have two separate causes pending, one relating to the dissolution of the marriage, and the other to the property. His lordship added that, in exercising the very extraordinary powers now vested in him with regard to property, it seemed to him that he should have to enter into inquiries without chart or compass for his guidance. By what rule, by what test was he to judge how much of a lady's property ought to be taken from her and given to her children? How was he to calculate the quantum?

Dr. Waddilove said it was left to the discretion of the Court.

His LORDSHIP said that that discretion must be exercised upon some principle. It was one of the most difficult and embarrassing kinds of authority that could be conferred upon a judge. One element in the inquiry would probably be what the children had already, and how much their father was able to give them. He did not understand that the authority was conferred upon him for the purpose of punishing the delinquent wife. The object was to provide for the children. He should at present decline to order the petition for a settlement to be set down for trial.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice BLACKBURN.)

Jan. 11.—During the trial of one Lewis Robert Poole for perjury committed by him in his examination before a commissioner in bankruptcy, a clerk in the telegraph office in London, who had been subpoenaed to produce the original of a telegraph message despatched from the company's office at Walsall, declined producing it without he was ordered to do so by his lordship.

Mr. Justice BLACKBURN said, it was a very proper regulation not to allow the messages that were given to them in confidence to be made public, but, although an attorney might claim his privilege, a telegraph company could not, and the witness must produce the message if he was subpoenaed to do so.

MANSSION HOUSE.

Jan. 12.—Application was made to the Lord Mayor by Mr. Martin, barrister, instructed by Messrs. Van Sandau & Cumming, for a summons against one William Henry Wells, of 172, Fenchurch-street, calling upon him to hand over to Messrs. Redfern & Alexander, of No. 6, Great Winchester-street, any letters he might have in his possession intended for them. It appeared that in September last, Mr. Wells took part of the house, No. 172, Fenchurch-street, and commenced trading under the style of Alexander Redfern & Co; that from some mistake the names of Messrs. Redfern & Alexander have been omitted from the Post-Office Directory; and that consequently, from the similarity of the names of the two firms, letters &c. intended for the latter firm were delivered at 172, Fenchurch street.

The LORD MAYOR thought that if the applicants were quite sure that letters intended for them had been sent to the house in Fenchurch-street, and they could identify them, he would be justified in summoning Mr. Wells before the Court to shew cause why he had not given them up, but under the circumstances disclosed, he did not consider it was in his power to assist the applicants.

EQUITY.

MASTER AND APPRENTICE—JURISDICTION OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY—DEMURRER—OBLIGATION OF PRECEDENTS.

Webb v. England, M. R., 9 W. R. 184.

The principal question in Webb v. England was upon the jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases between master and apprentice; but other and incidental questions of importance also arose in the suit, and were considered at the hearing. Where a master improperly turns away an apprentice, has a court of equity power to compel the return of a proportion of the premium paid with the apprentice? There are several cases to be found in the reports in which questions similar in principle were involved; but it will be found that nearly all of them introduced some different element, as, for instance, the bankruptcy of the party against whom relief is sought. The only authority directly in point is Therman v. Abell, 2 Vern. 64 (decided A.D. 1688). There it was distinctly held that the Court has power to decree repayment of a proportion of the premium, where a master turns away his apprentice, although in that case "negligence and misdemeanours" were laid to the charge of the latter. But it ought to be mentioned that Lord Chancellor Jefferys, who in that case made the decree did so "the rather, because the indentures were not enrolled, so as the matter was not properly cognisable before the Chamberlain of London." Mr. Spence, in the first volume of his "Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery," p. 698, upon the authority of a case decided in the reign of Philip and Mary (Richards v. Whitney, 3 & 4 Will. & Mary, 198)—before the statute law much interfered with the relations of masters and apprentices—states that in those times the Court of Chancery was in the habit of making orders for the regulation of the conduct of apprentices according to equity and conscience. If any account were to be taken of that solitary case, it might be assumed that the Court would also enforce the equitable obligations attached to the position of master. But as from time to time the question of the relations of masters and apprentices assumed greater importance in this country, the subject was dealt with by Acts of Parliament—it being of a character very likely to attract the notice of the Legislature. At all events, there was an interval of a century between Richards v. Whitney and Therman v. Abell, during which no case involving the same question appears in the chancery reports; and for the next half century there is an entire absence of such cases. The precise question, however, was raised before Lord Hardwicke (A.D. 1739), in Argles v. Heaseman 1 Atk. 518, in which his lordship held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to interfere in respect of the premium, where an apprentice has not from any cause served the whole of his time; and in that case the apprentice, alleging that he had quitted on being misused, Lord Hardwicke considered that this circumstance was not sufficient to give jurisdiction to a court of equity, as the question might be determined in an action at law. It does not appear whether the case of Therman v. Abell was in the knowledge of Lord Hardwicke when he arrived at this decision; but his lordship refers to the statute of 5 Eliz. c. 4, s. 35, relating to apprentices, as another reason why a court of equity should not assume a jurisdiction which the Legislature had committed to justices of the peace.

In Webb v. England the question was, whether the Court could compel a return of part of the premium to an apprentice who had, before the expiration of his time, been prevented from working by the master (as alleged) without reason? The premium, however, being £200, it appeared to be conceded that the case was not within the statutes which give jurisdiction to justices in cases between masters and apprentices. The relief sought by the bill was, first, cancellation of the articles, and secondly, a return of part of the premium; and there was an alternative prayer for specific performance of the contract of apprenticeship. Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls, would not decree that the articles should be delivered up to be cancelled; because the Court only made such decrees in cases of fraud, duress, or the like—where the instrument was void from the beginning. He also refused specific performance, upon the ground that adequate relief could be obtained at law, in an action for breach of covenant. The only question, then, that remained to be considered was, as to the jurisdiction of the Court in the case of master and apprentice; and his Honour feeling himself not to be bound by authority—which was so very meagre and conflicting—held that upon principle the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere, the case not being governed by those decisions which established the jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree a return of premium where, by reason of an accident (ex. gr., death or bankruptcy) the contract had been imperfectly performed. "This apportionment," said his Honour, "either in the case of damages, or as part of the premium, was to be obtained at law; and this Court could not interfere, unless it was found that the possession of the deed gave to either party an advantage."

There are several reported cases in which courts of equity have afforded relief by ordering the return of a portion of premium. It does so where, by reason of an accident, the contract in respect of which the premium was paid cannot be performed. The decisions of courts of law are not very uniform on this point; but those of courts of equity have been so. In Ex parte Pranker, 3 Ba. & Ald. 257; and Ex parte Bayley, 9 B. & C. 691, the former the case of an apprentice and the latter that of an articulated clerk, the right to a return of a portion of the premium was upheld. But in Re Thompson, 1 Exch. 864, the Court of Exchequer refused to order an attorney to repay any portion of a premium of 200 guineas, received by him with an articulated clerk, who died within a month after he was articulated. It was conceded that no action would lie, there having been no breach of contract, and the question was, whether the Court would interfere upon equitable grounds. The Court, however, refused, giving no reasons for its refusal, except that there were great difficulties in the matter. In some cases, courts of common law exercise such a jurisdiction—not merely upon the ground of the expediency of a summary jurisdiction for deciding differences between attorneys and their articulated clerks—but upon equitable and general grounds.

It has long been decided, that in a court of equity, upon the death of an attorney during the articles of a clerk, the estate of the attorney is liable to pay back a proportion of the premium. In Newton v. Rouse (1687), 1 Vern. 460, although the articles provided for the case of the death of the attorney within one year, nevertheless, having died under that period, the Court decreed his executor to pay back 100 out of 120 guineas premium. And so in Hurst v. Tolson, 16 Sim. 620, Sir L. Shadwell, V. C. E., decided that where an attorney to whom a clerk was articulated died before the expiration of the articles, the Court had jurisdiction to order part of the premium paid to the attorney to be repaid out of his assets. Upon that case coming upon appeal before Lord Cottenham, his lordship remarks upon the great dearth of modern authority upon the subject, and minutely discusses the principle involved in the case; bearing in mind, however, that the claim had been made in an administration suit, in which the Court sometimes decides upon claims upon which otherwise it might refuse to adjudicate. Independently of the right of the clerk under the covenant, there was a right arising from the transaction itself, the consideration for which the premium was paid having partly failed. "There is," said Lord Cottenham, "a premium paid for a risk not run, and money given in anticipation of a future benefit which is not enjoyed. In either case, the consideration failing, the money must be paid back again."

A similar question sometimes arises between members of a partnership, where one has paid to another a sum of money in consideration of the contract of partnership; and it is now well established that upon the bankruptcy of a partner, a premium paid by a co-partner in consideration of a partnership for a certain term, will, so far as the doctrines of a court of equity permit, be dealt with in a similar way. A court of equity will order that in taking the partnership account, the partner having paid a premium will be credited with a proportionate part, if not with the whole of such premium. Akhurst v. Jackson (1 Swans. 85), is, no doubt, an authority that where the partnership has actually begun, the contract has been performed, and the whole premium, or consideration money, is payable,—even where it is agreed that part of it is to be paid by instalments, some of which fall due after the bankruptcy of one of the partners had occurred. More modern decisions, however, have rejected this authority, and Bury v. Allen, 1 Coll. 589, and Freeland v. Stansfeld, 2 Sim. & Giff. 479, are express authorities to the effect that in such a case the Court will decree a return of a proportion of the premium; according to Featherstonhaugh v. Turner, 26 Beav. 382, even where there is no definite term of partnership, a person cannot, after receiving a premium from an incoming partner, immediately afterwards dissolve the business, retaining the premium; and in Astle v. Wright, 23 Beav. 77, where the partnership was for a term of years, before the expiration of which the partners disagreed, upon a dissolution of the partnership by the Court, it directed a due proportion of a premium to be returned to one of the partners who had paid it. "The rule," said Sir John Romilly, M.R., in his judgment in that case, "in which I have followed other judges, is this, that in the absence of any fraud or gross misconduct on either side, and where the continuation of the partnership has become impossible by reason of incompatibility of temper, or other causes springing from the parties themselves, and not accompanied by circumstances which are controlled by the contract, I have treated the premium as having been paid for the whole of the term of the partnership. I have apportioned so much of it as belonged to the period the partnership had lasted, and have ordered a return of the rest. Here, a premium of £1,000 (£500 paid down, and £500 by instalments), was to be given for a partnership of fourteen years, and, therefore, one fourteenth part of £1,000 is, in my opinion, attributable to each year."

In Webb v. England no great stress appears to have been laid upon the right of the plaintiff to a specific performance of the articles. Sir John Romilly, M.R., observes that "the Court could not compel an apprentice to work, or a master to teach," and in his judgment proceeds upon the sufficiency of the remedy at law. It may perhaps, however, be questioned whether damages would in all cases be a sufficient remedy to an apprentice who was wrongly deprived of the instruction of his master; or that courts of law have any measure for the injury which may be sustained in some such cases. It is obvious that an apprentice may have an interest not only in being instructed, but in the reputation of having been instructed, by a particular master, for the deprivation of which no adequate relief could be had at law. It can no more be said that one master may be as good as another, than that one piece of land may answer the purposes of a purchaser as well as another piece which he has bought, and which, notwithstanding this argument, a court of equity will give him in specie. Of course, there is always very great difficulty in enforcing a contract which involves the continuance of personal relations between the parties, and the due performance of which requires that these relations should be maintained at least amicably; and it was mainly upon this ground, no doubt, that the Master of the Rolls considered that he could not decree specific performance of the articles of apprenticeship. The Court would not so enforce an agreement for a partnership, because it might be fairly considered impossible that any business could be properly conducted by a firm whose members were hostile to each other, and desired a disruption of the firm. Whether there is the same reason in the case of the apprentice of a manufacturer or engineer, is perhaps a question of degree rather than of principle.

A point of practice worth noting was also decided in Webb v. England. The defendant had answered, but submitted that the Court had no jurisdiction in the case, and claimed the same benefit from that defence as if he had demurred. That being so, the Master of the Rolls, although he decided in favour of the defendant and dismissed the bill, yet did so without costs, upon the ground that the defendant should have merely demurred.

This case, also, is a curious illustration of the difficulty in which the Court is sometimes placed in estimating the obligation of particular precedents. Therman v. Abell was, in the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, a "case exactly like the present;" while the more modern decision of Argles v. Heaseman was "a direct authority the other way." Now, according to the common understanding of the rule, Lord Hardwicke, in pronouncing his decision in the latter case, was bound by that of his predecessor in the former, the doctrine of which could not in point of theory be reversed, except by the House of Lords. Theoretically, therefore, the decision of Lord Jefferys would appear to furnish the rule of the Court in such cases: practically, however, when a long interval elapses between two conflicting decisions, the obligation of the earlier one is not considered as great as if the case had been comparatively recent; and judges deem themselves at liberty to weigh the reasons of both, unless indeed they feel either compelled by the superiority of the tribunal to submit to either decision.

COMMON LAW.

THE COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1860—SECTION 34, HOW FAR RETROSPECTIVE—COSTS IN FRIVOLOUS ACTIONS.

Wright v. Hale, 9 W. R., Exch., 157.

It is believed that this is the first decision which has been reported upon the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860; and it turns upon the construction of one of its provisions with regard to which a variety of points may, and probably will, be hereafter raised. The present one affects in its principle other parts also of the Act, and is the same as has been usually raised with regard to important statutes which reform or change the previous law—viz., to what extent (if any) the Act is retrospective. Thus, shortly after the Procedure Act of 1852, that statute was held to regulate the manner of reviving a judgment which had been signed prior to its passing (Boodle v. Davis, 8 Exch. 351). On the other hand, in the question which arose as to whether an appeal from the judgment of the Court upon a point reserved before the Procedure Act of 1854, was rightly brought, it was held that the provisions of that Act, under which the proceedings by way of appeal were taken, could apply only to a point reserved after the passing of the Act (Vansittart v. Taylor, 24 L. J., Exch. C., 198), the decision in the latter case being grounded upon the general maxim of law, "Nova constitutio futuris formam debet imponere, non prateritis." In the present case, the question was upon the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 34, which gives a new rule for costs in frivolous actions for wrongs—enacting that where a verdict under £5 is recovered, the plaintiff is to obtain no costs from the defendant if the presiding judge certifies, immediately afterwards, that the action was not really brought to try right besides the mere right to recover damages, and that the trespass or grievance in respect of which the action was brought was not wilful and malicious, and that the action was not fit to be brought. And a certificate to the above effect having been given at the trial, it was sought to be set aside by the plaintiff, on the ground that the action had been commenced previously to the passing of the Act, though tried afterwards. The plaintiff relied chiefly upon the legal principle or maxim above given, and contended that the proceedings having once begun, the plaintiff had acquired a vested right to his costs, of which he could not be deprived, unless by the express words of an Act of Parliament. As to this argument, however, the Court remarked that the whole subject of costs was one of practice, not rights of parties inter sese, to which alone the constitutional principle which had been quoted applied; and, accordingly, refused to disturb the certificate which had been given.

DEVISE UPON A CONDITION, CONSTRUCTION OF.

Wright v. Wilkin, 9 W. R., Q. B., 161.

In "Sugden on Powers" (vol. i., p. 122, 7th ed.) it is in effect laid down that in most cases where an estate is devised in fee to A "upon condition" that he will do so and so, such a devise instead of conferring an estate upon condition (as by a deed at common law) which if broken will give the heir of the testator a right of entry, will be construed as a devise in fee upon trust, the performance of such trust being compellable by a suit in equity. This doctrine was considered and approved by the Court of Queen's Bench in the present case, in which the contrary construction of such a devise was relied upon by the plaintiff in an action of ejectment, as entitling him to oust a devisee, who (having taken possession of the estate devised to him) had neglected to perform the condition, namely, to pay certain legacies within a certain time after the death of the testator. The Court, in giving judgment for the defendant, commented on and approved of the above passage in Lord St. Leonards' work, and further observed, that though there were some legal terms which had an inflexible force, not to be gained, such, for example, as "heir-at-law," no such force had ever been ascribed to the word "condition," which was often used in contracts as equivalent to "term;" and that they were not disposed to extend the area of legal terms.

It is to be observed that the doctrine upon which the decision in this case proceeded, does not apply to where there are limitations over upon the conditions being broken.

CHURCH-RATE—QUAKERS—JURISDICTION OF JUSTICES.

Backhouse, Appellant, v. Bishopscarmouth, Churchwardens of, Respondents, 9 W. R., C. P., 162.

The general law as to enforcing a church-rate is well known. Any arrears to the amount of £10, and provided no question be raised as to the legal liability of the party assessed, may be recovered before two justices of the peace. If the arrears are larger, or the liability to pay be disputed, then the remedy is in the Ecclesiastical Court. In the particular case of Quakers, however, the sum that may be recovered before the magistrates is extended to £50; but the proviso with regard to a disputed liability is the same. This last proposition, indeed, has been denied in works of authority. Thus, in "Prideaux's Churchwarden's Guide" (7th ed., p. 176) it is said in effect, that the proceedings against Quakers are not under 53 Geo. 3, c. 127 (as in the case of other persons), but under 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 34, which contains no provision excluding the jurisdiction of justices in cases of disputed liability; and that, consequently, in the case of Quakers the justices have always jurisdiction to the extent of £50. And this doctrine is adopted by Mr. Oke in the sixth edition of his "Magisterial Synopsis" (p. 816). The point, however, was directly raised in the present case, and decided against the jurisdiction of the justices. The validity of a rate was bonâ fide objected to by a Quaker who had been summoned for not paying them; and his objection was, that the vestry by whom the rate had been made was illegally constituted; but the magistrates declined to enter into the question, and made an order for payment, subject to a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43. The Court of Common Pleas said that the words of the statutes themselves were doubtful upon the point, and that if their intention was to oust the magisterial jurisdiction, in case of a Quaker disputing the rate, such intention was but imperfectly expressed. But the Court held, nevertheless, that the jurisdiction impugned did not exist, on account of the general rule that the summary jurisdiction of justices ceases whenever a matter of title comes into question before them; and because nothing appeared in the Acts to exclude the application of this principle. In the case of Rex v. Wakefield (1 Burr. 487) the Court of Queen's Bench, under Lord Mansfield, gave a judgment which inferentially supports the view now taken of this matter by the Court of Common Pleas.

MR. LOCKE KING'S ACT, 17 & 18 VICT. c. 113.—EXONERATION.

It appears to me that the heir is not entitled to have the mortgage debt paid off out of the personal estate.

The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113, provides that when any person shall, after the 31st of December, 1854, die seized of any estate in any land, &c., charged with any sum by way of mortgage, and such person shall not by his will, &c., have signified any contrary or other intention, the heir or devisee shall not be entitled to have the mortgage debt discharged out of the personal estate; but the land shall, as between the different persons claiming under the deceased, be primarily liable—with a proviso saving the rights of the mortgagee, and a proviso that nothing in the Act contained shall affect the rights of any person claiming under any will, deed, or document, made before the 1st of January, 1855.

As the testator died after the 31st of December, 1854, the heir, by the express provisions of the Act, takes the land subject to the mortgage. The second proviso does not apply. The Act does not affect the rights of any person claiming under the will, and the rights of the heir are not saved, as he does not claim under any deed or document, but at common law.

In the recent case of Woolstencroft v. Woolstencroft, 9 W. R. 42 (decided on the 19th of November, 1860), the Lord Chancellor reversed a decision of V. C. Stuart, and held that a general direction by a testator in his will to pay debts, did not exonerate a devised estate from the mortgage debt. In giving judgment, the Lord Chancellor says that the Legislature had become desirous that mortgage debts should be paid by the heir or devisee who took the lands, unless the testator signified a contrary intention, and that such intention must be signified by express words, or by language intimating that he meant the heir or devisee to take the land free of the charge, and to throw the charge upon his personal estate.

In the case stated by your correspondent, I suppose the testator had not by his will used apt words to pass his estate in the land, as the mere fact of the purchase having been made subsequently to the making of the will, would not prevent the estate passing under it. C.

RENT CHARGE—WHEN IS IT "IN ARREAR AND UNPAID?"—MODE OF DEMANDING PAYMENT.

By the 29th section of the 23rd & 24th Vict., c. 93, if the rent charge in lieu of tithes is "in arrear and unpaid" for twenty-one days, and it shall be necessary for the person entitled, in order to enforce payment, to give notice of his intention to distrain, he may make a certain charge to cover the expenses of such notice.

The words "in arrear and unpaid," which govern the whole clause, are the same as are used in the 81st section of the 6th & 7th Will. 4, c. 71, authorizing the recovery by distress; but neither in that Act, nor in any of the Amendment Acts, can I find any clause prescribing any particular mode of demanding payment of the rent charge, or declaring in what manner or after what default it shall be deemed to be "in arrear and unpaid."

Such rent charge being, therefore, by the 67th section of the 6th & 7th Will. 4, c. 71, "in the nature of a rent charge issuing out of the lands charged therewith," it seems questionable whether it can be in arrear, except on nonpayment after a demand made of the tenant on the land by the person entitled, or by his agent regularly authorized by letter of attorney, which, according to the general law, appears to be the strict legal mode of demanding such a rent charge.

As the late Act has legalized a charge, it will, undoubtedly be resorted to more frequently than heretofore; and the point to which I have adverted has become more important—the ordinary application being only a letter to the tenant requesting his attendance at some place in the parish to pay the rent charge. But as the point materially affects the operation of the Tithe Acts and the practice of tithe owners, I beg to solicit the opinion of your correspondents on the construction to be put upon the words "in arrear and unpaid" in the section before referred to.

STAMPS ON NOTES PAYABLE ON DEMAND.

In the almanack published this year by the proprietors of the Solicitors' Journal I observe in the abstract of the seal of stamps upon bills and notes, it is stated that the stamp for "any sum on demand" is one penny.

Some time ago, upon looking into the Act of Parliament I came to the same conclusion; but finding some difference of opinion on the point, I requested the stamp distributor of the town in which I live to apply to the proper authority in London to determine it.

The answer is, that on notes, &c., on demand, the duty is an ad valorem. The point is one of too much importance to be left in doubt; and, perhaps, the insertion of the above facts will tend, by the opinions it will elicit, to have the doubt solved.

THE NEGRO EXTRADITION CASE

As to slavery being unable to exist in the free air of England and Scotland, see the ruling to that effect referred to in 3 Macq., House of Lords Reports 538. Knight v. Wedderburn is certainly prior to Somerset's case in England; it is reported in "Morrison's Dictionary of Scotch Decisions," p. 14,545.

SOUTH AUSTRALIAN CONVEYANCING.

I think your readers should know that their professional brethren in South Australia are by no means enamoured of Mr. Torrens' scheme for the Registration and Transfer of Real Property. With, literally, two or three exceptions, every barrister and solicitor in the colony is opposed to it, not merely because it has for its object the entire destruction of conveyancing, as understood here, but because they are of opinion that it will not be found to work well in practice for the public. Whether this opinion be right or wrong, I, who have not examined the subject, cannot say; but it certainly should be known that it exists. At a public entertainment recently given to Mr. Torrens by some of his friends, in order to celebrate the passing of his Real Property Act, only one member of the legal profession was present, and the absence of his fellows was attributed by one of the speakers to the distrust and dislike which the lawyers, as a body, felt of the measure. Indeed, so averse are they to transacting business under its provisions that a new class of conveyancers, not professional men, has sprung up who do the conveyancing under the Torrens' Act, and are known as land brokers. Whether this kind of thing would suit Lincoln's-inn and the country solicitors is doubtful.

LEEDS.—At the Leeds Borough sessions on the 10th inst., the court was placed in a singular and awkward dilemma. Two courts had been sitting since the opening of the sessions, and as soon as an appeal had been decided, the recorder desired Mr. Maule, the assistant-recorder, to open the second court, but there were only two cases for trial, and the counsel in attendance were engaged in both, and their clients refused to allow them to give up their briefs. One of the cases (a misdemeanour) was sent over to Mr. Maule, but there were no counsel for the prisoners, and their solicitors applied that they should be heard by the counsel retained for them, namely Mr. Middleton and Mr. Foster, who were then engaged in the other court. The deputy-recorder called upon the counsel to appear, but they replied that they were retained in the only other case for trial, which, being a felony, must be taken first, and as the solicitors for the prosecution and the defence would not allow them to hand over their briefs, they could not go over. The question was then whether the prisoners in one or both cases should be tried without counsel. This course was objected to, and Mr. Blanshard, who was instructed to prosecute in the misdemeanour, said he could not accede to a postponement or an adjournment, as he had been waiting the whole of the previous day for the trial. The prosecutors in the felony also objected to a postponement. The recorder said he could not waive the public convenience for the convenience of the bar, and the counsel instructed must hand over their briefs. It was replied that if they did so, no other gentlemen could undertake them without two or three hours examination and consultation. After some further discussion, and as the only means of getting out of the difficulty, it was arranged that the second court should be adjourned until one o'clock, and that Mr. Maule (the recorder being unwell) should sit in the first court. The practical result was that he had to take both cases.

LIVERPOOL.—At a meeting of the Council of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, held on the 7th inst., it was resolved, on the recommendation of the Commercial Law Committee, to solicit the Lord de Grey and Ripon to introduce a measure into the House of Lords for the compulsory registration of private partnerships, similar in principle to that brought forward by him in 1858. The same committee recommended that the council should memorialise the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward a Bill for consolidating the Acts relating to stamp duties (the present Acts extending over a period of seventy years), all of which the committee stated it was necessary to consult in order to ascertain the validity or otherwise of documents subject to those laws.

Review.

The Conflict of Laws in Cases of Divorce. By PATRICK FRASER, Advocate. Edinburgh, 1860.

Many works have been written on the conflict of laws; but we are not aware of any writer who has chosen the harmony of laws for his title. Perhaps the terms law and harmony are too generally incompatible; at any rate, the writer of the present pamphlet, both in style and matter, manifestly prefers conflict to harmony. All writers, however, Mr. Fraser not excepted, treat the subject of international law with some degree of faith in a possible harmony, and aim at discovering the principles and maxims on which an universal intercommunion of law amongst civilized nations may be established. Amongst states which equally respect the rights of humanity, and adopt sound principles of social life, a perfectly harmonious communion of law not only may, but in a great measure does, exist; whilst with states where laws and institutions are barbarous and inhuman, no similar harmony can prevail, and conflicts of laws are inevitable. With a nation like the Chinese, it is difficult to treat even on terms of war; the only safe mode of dealing being to keep them at long range, and parley through the speaking trumpet. Amongst the United States of America, the institution of slavery in some States involves such conflicts with the laws of those States which respect the common freedom of humanity, as to endanger a federation compacted in all other respects by the strongest links of sympathy and interest; and the extradition case now pending affords a striking example of the difficulties which this unnatural institution produces, in the construction and fulfilment of treaties with foreign nations. The practice of polygamy amongst the Turks and other infidel nations, prevents all communion of law with the nations of Christendom on the subject of marriage, and probably renders it impossible for the latter to recognise any status amongst the former analogous to what is understood by marriage amongst themselves. So, likewise, whilst the English law regarded marriage as absolutely indissoluble, there could be no communion with other European nations on the subject of divorce. The legalization of divorce has at once opened to our courts a new access to foreign jurisprudence, and an extensive province of international law from which they have hitherto been excluded. The large question as to the jurisdiction over persons of the English Courts to grant divorce, and as to the effect of the divorces of foreign courts in this country, are comparatively new to English lawyers. Little native authority is to be found on the subject, and this extensive chapter of international jurisprudence remains as yet to be written in the language of English law, and introduced to the practice of English tribunals.

Amongst the most important relations to be settled in this matter is, of course, that which is to subsist between the English jurisdiction, and that of the sister kingdom of Scotland. With this object, a Bill was introduced last session, first in the House of Commons, where it was dropped from pressure of business, and subsequently in the House of Lords, under the auspices of the Lord Chancellor. The chief clause in "the Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Bill," as it was entitled, proposed to enact that a decree of divorce pronounced by the Court of Session should dissolve the marriage throughout all her Majesty's dominions. A subsidiary clause was framed on the principle of establishing the general jurisdiction of the Scotch Court to divorce on the domicile of the parties, as regulated by the law of succession. Hitherto the Scotch Courts had exercised a far wider jurisdiction, the mere presence of the defender in the territory, amongst other grounds, being sufficient to render his married status amenable to the Scotch law. The Faculty of Advocates remonstrated against this sweeping inroad made upon the ancient law by the proposed Bill; and upon the motion of the Lord Advocate in the House of Commons, the above clauses were rejected, an amendment to which the House of Lords declined to accede.

The principle is universally admitted that the English law should henceforth recognize the validity of Scotch divorce; the inconvenience and anomaly of persons remaining husband and wife upon one side of the Tweed while they are separated on the other, being manifest to everybody. The controversy turns upon settling the limits of the jurisdiction of the Scotch Court, with a view to its decrees being effective throughout all British dominions. If the laws of the two countries are to be thoroughly amalgamated, which every well wisher of both countries would desire, the jurisdiction and causes of divorce should be made identical in both countries. If they are to be treated as the laws of independent States, whose decrees are to be interchangeably received on the usual terms of international comity, the jurisdiction in each must be founded on principles which can be accepted by both, in order to give their decrees a common validity in both countries. On this point of the jurisdiction there is at present an essential incompatibility between the national tribunals. The English law repudiates any foreign interference with a marriage celebrated in England, though it must be confessed that the new Divorce Court has commenced by asserting a very extensive authority over foreign marriages, and over persons domiciled abroad (see the cases of Simorin v. Mallac, 29 L. J. P. & M. 97, and Deck v. Deck, 29 L. J. P. & M. 129). The extreme limits of the English jurisdiction has on most points still to be settled. The Scotch Court is elder sister to the English, and has long ago come into full exercise of her powers, which are of the amplest possible extent. A stranger who sets foot over the border may be at once cited to defend a divorce suit. Forty days' residence justifies a citation left at his dwelling-house. A native born Scotchman can never exempt himself from the jurisdiction of the courts over his marriage statue, however far or fixelly he may have transferred his domicile and allegiance to another State; and he fact of adultery committed within the country alone gives jurisdiction to the courts to adjudicate upon the married status. Such claims are quite inadmissible by the traditional jealousy with which England watches over the marriages celebrated by her own law and between her own children. The science of private international law, as at present understood, is insufficient to reconcile the conflict, and, therefore, a legislative compromise seemed the last resource. The proposed Bill of last session was an attempt of this kind, and sought to establish definite domicile as the ground of jurisdiction over status. It seems certainly somewhat premature, with our present imperfect lights, to fix this principle with the stamp of legislative authority. It cannot as yet be said to be proved demonstratively as the scientific rule, though we may establish some plausible probabilities of being so. At any rate, English jurists can hardly expect their learned brethren in Scotland to receive it, if the former are not willing to accept a similar restriction upon the jurisdiction of the English Court.

Mr. Fraser enters into this controversy between the English and Scotch laws, and the proposed legislative reconciliation, with much learning and with great ability. It would be well indeed if every important question of jurisprudence were discussed with the same accurate statement, profound knowledge, and clearness of argument. His work supplies comparative accounts of the English and Scottish laws of divorce, with extensive illustrations drawn from foreign sources, and a fund of varied and important information on the subject, which cannot fail to be highly serviceable when the matter is again brought forward, and should be read and studied by all who are desirous to form a judgment upon it. The style is forcible and pleasant, and the arguments used possess the great recommendation of being unmistakably clear. This quality has, perhaps, enabled us to see our way more readily to one or two points in which we differ from him.

We dispute altogether the analogy drawn by him, in common with others, between civil contracts and marriage. The latter, according to Mr. Fraser, may be appropriately included under the category of the Roman obligations quasi ex contractu, which we believe pointed to well known transactions of a totally different kind. Marriage is a status, and not a contract; and the jurisdiction of every State to determine the status of its own subjects is a matter of public law, and quite different in kind from the jurisdiction over civil rights, or the mere civil administration of justice. Again, we are not convinced of the soundness of the principle of Scottish jurisprudence, according to Mr. Fraser, of assimilating divorce to a punishment imposed by the criminal law. Scotland, it appears, cannot tolerate the scandal of the immorality of the sojourners within her borders, and, therefore, vindicates public decency by visiting them with divorce. The penalty for adultery in Scotland by the criminal law, is death. It is found either unnecessary or inexpedient to put the law in force against natives; but Mr. Fraser threatens that it will become necessary to do so against foreigners, English tourists included, if the present mode of punishment by way of divorce is taken away. He says:—"It is no doubt true that, in modern times, public opinion has not required the Lord Advocate to prosecute criminally the committers of adultery. But let a law be passed which shall render it impracticable or impossible to obtain relief by divorce, and then inevitably the reaction will come, and the Lord Advocate will be called upon to put in motion a machinery that will obtain divorce in a more unpleasant form. Our present system, which dissolves the marriage of an Englishman for his adultery in Scotland, may not be agreeable south of the Tweed; but the hard expressions which are used towards our law in this matter, would receive no small modification if, instead of being divorced, the adulterous Englishman were hanged. Suppose the Lord Chancellor carried his clause to-morrow, can there be the least doubt that this loophole of relief being stopped up, a new one would be found, under the existing law, the propriety of enforcing which, in such circumstances, would be less open to question than if it were tried at present?"

Mr. Fraser is a zealous advocate for Scotch law, and is not willing to abate one jot of its pretensions. He claims that a Scotch decree of divorce, pronounced according to the law at present in force, shall be universally respected. He deals hardly with English judges and lawyers for their non-compliance hitherto, and lectures them upon their better behaviour for the future. "The time has come for the English courts to robe themselves in the dignity of a graceful repentance, and in the presence of the profession in Europe and America to admit their error." We are inclined to honour the zeal of a Scotch advocate in favour of the venerable jurisprudence of his country, and to regard it with indulgence even where it verges beyond the limits of moderation. In the following passage, Mr. Fraser surely overrates the feelings entertained towards his country in this friendly kingdom:—

"Will English people never forgive Bannockburn? On the north side of the Tweed, their old enemies have long forgiven, though not forgotten. Flodden! No Scotchman, indeed, ever thinks of the one without elation, or of the other without tears. But there is in this sensibility none of the insolence of triumph, nor the rancour of undying revenge! The case appears to be otherwise in England. The judgments of the Supreme Courts of a friendly kingdom are treated with a discourtesy that would be inexcusable in reference to the decisions of a Turkish cadi or a Texan slave court."

which cannot fail to recommend itself to all who are capable of appreciating the difference, upon such delicate ground as private international law, between the pure scientific fabric of jurisprudence, and the clumsy workmanship of parliamentary tinkering:—"But even supposing that the judgments of the supreme courts of Scotland are in England held as of no more value than those of Turkey, must we immediately resort to legislation? Can it, with any sense of propriety be said, that the subject is ripe for codification when we find as many different expositions of it as there are states, and when the examples of codification are the great beacons of error? The matter must be first reasoned out in the courts, and the decisions must be tested by experience. Modifications, too, of old doctrines will result from the increased intercourse of these days; and much may be done when the narrow spirit of national rivalry and jealous antipathies shall still more recede before advancing civilisation. The time is not far distant, when the Christian precept of doing to others as we would that others should do to us, shall be held applicable to nations as to individuals, and that it is both a judicial error and a national misfortune to annul foreign judgments (untainted by immoral or irreligious elements), merely because they happen not to be in unison with local opinion."

ON THE BANKRUPTCY LAW OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

At the meeting of the Social Science Congress held at Glasgow, last Autumn, Mr. Sheriff Bell read the following paper:—

My object in this paper is to point out the leading differences between the bankruptcy law of England and Scotland, as regulated by statute, and to consider, as briefly as possible, in what particulars the one system is superior or inferior to the other.

A striking dissimilarity as regards the judicial machinery employed in the administration of bankruptcy meets us at the threshold. In Scotland, bankruptcy is administered in the ordinary courts as a portion of their ordinary jurisdiction; in England, separate courts with a separate and numerous staff, are appropriated to this particular jurisdiction. In Scotland, what is there termed sequestration, and in England, "adjudication of bankruptcy," may be awarded, since 1856, not only by the Court of Session, but by all the Sheriff Courts, which are empowered to exercise the same judicial functions in bankruptcy within their own jurisdictions as the Court of Session may do throughout all Scotland—under this safeguard, that the Sheriff's deliverances and judgments are, with certain statutory exceptions, subject to the review of the Supreme Court. Since 1856 not more than twenty per cent. of the Scotch sequestrations have been awarded in the Court of Session, and at least eighty per cent. have originated in the local courts, which are situated in the immediate localities where the bankrupt and the bulk of his creditors reside. Even the twenty per cent., though awarded, are not subsequently conducted in the Court of Session, but are, on the contrary, immediately remitted to the particular Sheriff Court considered most convenient for the creditors, and it is in that Court exclusively that the trustee is confirmed, and the bankrupt examined, and in general discharged. By these arrangements bankruptcy is included in the jurisdiction of the Courts without making any appreciable demands upon the public revenue, and without carrying off, for the support of a judicial establishment, any of the assets of bankrupt estates. Neither has it been found that this system has given rise to any delay or confusion in the despatch of judicial business. In Glasgow, for example, there are, upon an average, not fewer than one hundred and sixty sequestrations awarded in the course of a year; and these, with all the judicial procedure arising out of them, are disposed of in the Court of the resident Sheriffs, equally with all the extensive mass of business included in their ordinary civil, criminal, and miscellaneous jurisdiction.

After referring to the inconvenience and expense of English courts of bankruptcy, and the mode in which those expenses are provided, Mr. Bell proceeded as follows:—

Whatever settlement of these matters may be ultimately come to, one thing is evident, that a chief difficulty in the way of improvements in the law of bankruptcy in England is a financial difficulty, and that this has arisen from the law being administered by a too complicated and expensive machinery, involving the maintenance of a separate judicial establishment.

No such difficulty has ever existed in Scotland. As already stated, little or no demand is here made on the general expenditure of the country, and only an extremely moderate one on the estates of debtors, to secure for them the benefit of judicial custody and supervision. The Attorney-General paid a just compliment to the Scotch system. He said:—"I painfully contrast, as far as our administration is concerned, our system of bankruptcy with the County Court system in Scotland. The Scotch have adhered to the old original Saxon institution of Sheriff Courts, and they have a system of administration in bankruptcy which works extremely well, the expense of which is represented as not exceeding 12 or 13 per cent., and which is carried out in the counties, chiefly by the Sheriff Courts, that answer every purpose. I should be glad if I had it in my power to devise a plan for removing the whole of the District Courts of Bankruptcy, and vesting the administration entirely in the County Courts." The Attorney-General confessed that the main reason for his not proposing this change was, that he would need to give the Commissioners and other officials full retiring allowances, and that he had no available means for doing so. This seems something tantamount to saying that the very magnitude of the evil is the reason that makes its continuance imperative.

England not only labours under the burden of this complicated machinery for the administration of bankruptcy, but possesses what to us in Scotland seems, perhaps, still more anomalous—another and separate court and system for the administration of insolvency. Insolvent debtors, who are not traders, have no remedy but the Insolvent Court, and the remedy there provided for them is only attained through the medium of imprisonment, and is, after all, a partial one. The future property of the insolvent discharged by the Insolvent Debtors' Court, still remains liable to his creditors; and in this respect the process resembles that which in Scotland is called cessio bonorum. It is difficult, however, to see, as was well pointed out by the Attorney General, why, if the debtor be honest, he should not in all cases be entitled to an absolute discharge, or why, under the one system, he should be entirely emancipated, and sent out to begin the world again, and to have the full benefit of his future industry; and under the other, to have his subsequent earnings and acquisitions loaded with the burden of his past liabilities. It was accordingly proposed by the Attorney-General—1st, To amalgamate the Insolvent Debtors' Court with the Court of Bankruptcy; and, 2nd, That in future no discharged or certificated bankrupt should hold his subsequently-acquired property liable for debts contracted before his bankruptcy. In Scotland, as actions of cessio are conducted before precisely the same tribunals as bankruptcies, and occasion no additional expense, no harm is done in continuing them as competent forms of procedure, it being generally in the option of the debtor to have his affairs wound up under the law of bankruptcy, if he prefers it. In point of fact, the facilities under the Scotch Bankrupt Act are now so great, that the number of cessios is much diminished; and, indeed, the more limited benefit of cessio is rarely now sought for except by very small dealers, whose principal object is to protect their persons against the diligence or incarceration, and who do not expect their future means will ever be such as to attract the attention of old creditors.

The Insolvent Debtors' Court no doubt owes its origin to the fact that in England the Court of Bankruptcy has never been open to any but traders. No such restriction now exists in Scotland. Under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856 (19th & 20th Vict., cap. 79), the privilege of sequestration is limited to no class, but is extended to all who can incur debt; whereas, in England it is only persons deemed to be traders, according to an enumeration of traders given in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act of 1849 (12th & 13th Vict., cap. 106), who are liable to be made bankrupts and to obtain an adjudication. Not only are all professional men, all landed proprietors, and all persons living on their own means, excluded from the operations of the Act, but such persons as farmers, graziers, labourers, or workmen for hire, and all members of, or subscribers to, any incorporated, commercial, or trading company established by Charter or Act of Parliament. It has been generally felt in Scotland that there is no sufficient reason why judicial facilities for winding up a bankrupt's estate should be confined to the class called traders, and the extension of the right to all debtors has been considered a wise measure, of which use has been largely made since 1856. In the Attorney-General's Bill the distinction was likewise abolished in England. The 152nd section provided that "all debtors, whether traders or not, shall be liable to be declared and adjudged bankrupt, and be subject to the provisions of this Act, and in the procedure to obtain adjudication, it shall no longer be necessary to show any trading on the part of the debtor." In the House of Commons this proposed enactment was strongly objected to; but the opposition arose not so much from a dislike to the principle on which it went as from its being thought that the Bill failed to make a sufficient distinction between acts of bankruptcy which might be committed by traders and non-traders.

Both in England and Scotland there are certain acts and circumstances, the doing or concurring of which make a man a bankrupt, or, in Scotch phrase, a notour bankrupt, and warrant a petition for sequestration at the instance of a creditor or creditors. In Scotland these acts and circumstances are strictly limited to such conduct on the part of the debtor as affords the strongest presumption of his being unable to extricate himself from legal diligence by payment of his debt. He must, for example, be shown to be insolvent, and to have been charged for payment, and to have been imprisoned or apprehended, or to have absconded, or taken refuge in the sanctuary, or to have had his moveable effects pointed, or heritable estates adjudged, or to have failed to loose or discharge an arrestment used against his goods. But in England various acts, which are in themselves harmless or indifferent, are held to be acts of bankruptcy, if done "with intent to defeat or delay creditors." It is often, however, difficult to ascertain with what intent an otherwise indifferent act has been done, and the same presumption will not always arise in the case of a trader and non-trader. Thus, departing the realm, or remaining abroad, departing from one's dwelling house, or absenting one's self from it, beginning to keep within house, conveying property, &c., are in England acts of bankruptcy, if done "with intent;" and, in as far as traders are concerned, this test is perhaps fair enough, for a trader cannot, in ordinary circumstances, remain forth of the realm for any long period, or absent himself from his ordinary dwelling-place, or keep exclusively within it, or gratuitously convey away property, without giving rise to the presumption that he is about cedere foro. But the same observation does not apply to many classes of non-traders, so that when the Attorney-General proposed simply to alter the word "trader" as contained in the Consolidation Act of 1849, into "any debtor," it became evidently necessary either to make a distinction in what were to be considered acts of bankruptcy, or to modify materially the existing Acts. This last course was adopted but, in the opinion of some, not to a sufficient extent. Country gentlemen and others took alarm, and maintained that some of the Acts still retained as tests of bankruptcy might be so in a trader, but did not admit of the same construction in the case of a non-trader. It will not be difficult, it is conceived, to obviate this objection; and, as the obtaining an adjudication of bankruptcy is really a privilege to an honest insolvent, it is to be hoped that the law of England will be assimilated in this respect to that of Scotland, by extending the provisions of a Consolidation Act to all and sundry.

CANADA EXTRADITION CASE.

We extract the following from a recent communication addressed to the Times:—

"The Canadian statute of extradition is awkwardly expressed. It speaks of "evidence sufficient to justify an apprehension," &c., and of "evidence sufficient to sustain a charge," &c., while the present case, though arising on that statute, has in truth nothing to do with the law of evidence, all the facts having been admitted, and no question having arisen as to the manner of proving them. If cleared from these expressions, so calculated to mislead, the statute in substance provides that a person charged in Canada with committing in the United States, or any of them, any of the offences mentioned in the treaty of extradition (and among others murder), is to be brought before a judge or justice of the peace in Canada, to the end that the evidence of his criminality be heard and considered, and that if on such hearing the case proved (not the evidence, as the statute has it) be deemed sufficient by law to sustain the charge, according to the laws of Canada, the judge or justice shall certify the same to the Governor, in order that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities in the United States, or any of them, for the surrender of the person charged. The question, therefore, now is, whether the case proved ought to have been deemed by the judges in Canada sufficient by law to sustain the charge according to the laws of Canada; for if it ought not, then their judgment should be set aside, and no warrant upon it should issue. But it seems difficult to resist the argument that their opinion upon this point was erroneous; for, according to the laws of Canada (which are for this purpose the same as the laws of England), the person charged was no slave, but a freeman, and therefore could not be lawfully seized and detained; and any person attempting to do so, on the ground that he was a fugitive slave, might be lawfully resisted, even unto death. The adverse view seems to proceed upon the ground that it is impossible to distinguish this case from one in which a person in the legal custody of a gaoler escapes by inflicting upon him a mortal wound; but there is surely the distinction that in the present case the party charged was not (according to the laws of Canada) escaping from a person having the right to detain him, but a person vindicating his right of freedom against one by whom it was illegally obstructed."

Another correspondent, writing on the same subject says:—

"The treaty binds us to deliver up a man who, as shown by prima facie evidence, has committed murder. But the treaty does not define "murder," and does not say whether the word, as used in the treaty, is in any given case to mean "murder" as defined by American law, or "murder" as defined by British law. It seems to have been assumed by the Canadian Courts that it must mean "murder" according to the municipal law of the place where the act was committed. But has not this assumption been too hastily made? Consider to what it would lead. It would make the international law of the two countries dependent on the specialities of local institutions and of municipal legislation, and even on the freaks of municipal draughtsmanship. If an American Legislature chose, for purposes of municipal legislation, to give to the crimes mentioned in the treaty a non-natural sense, it would bind us, whatever may have been our intention in the treaty, to give to the words in the treaty that absurd sense, and to deliver up prisoners accordingly."

Another correspondent of the same journal writes to the following effect:—

"Any contract between two individuals which could be strained to compel one of them to perform an act of injustice to a third party, would be declared by any court of law null and void. If, therefore, the treaty with the United States is so framed as to bind our Government to do an act of injustice to Anderson, such treaty is, pro hac vice, null and void.

"By all means let the case be decided by law; but if the decision is adverse to Anderson, I hope our Government will have sufficient moral rectitude to say to that of the United States:—'Our treaty with you has been so erroneously drawn up, that it enforces upon us an act of injustice. Any penalty for such an error must fall upon us, and not upon Anderson. We will never extricate ourselves from a political dilemma by sacrificing an innocent man.'"

We have received the following from correspondents of our own on the same subject:—

"It is to be hoped that the important question of a revision of our colonial laws and practice, as well as the prerogative jurisdiction to send a habeas from England to a colony to be there executed, will now receive discussion and decision. We speak from experience of the necessity for an entire revision of our colonial machinery as well as law.

"Having been engaged in the St. Helena case we may state that the habeas was originally granted to us at chambers by Mr. Baron Watson. The officials of the "crown office," who "rule the judges," refused to issue the writ on that fiat. The Court of Queen's Bench was moved by Mr. Solly Flood to direct them, and then suggested a substantive motion for the habeas. Lord Campbell was the first to countenance a writ of error, as well as the habeas, in that case after an interregnum of four centuries; and the great research of Mr. Flood was crowned with success in rescuing an innocent captain from a conviction, as unjust as it was illegal, and which his perseverance alone, without fee or reward, accomplished.

"There is this striking difference between that case and the slave case,—that was a conviction and a writ of error; this is not merely a fugitive slave case but a charge of murder, with an extradition treaty. Mr Flood's researches are now available for the important discussion of the question, which was avoided in the St. Helena case by a pardon.

"Perhaps these remarks may be worth insertion.

Yesterday afternoon a fire occurred at No. 13, King's Bench Walk, Inner Temple, which occasioned very serious damage to the chambers in the occupation of Sir David Dundas, Mr. T. H. Patteson, and Mr. R. Ingham. Sir David Dundas, we are informed, is a very severe sufferer by the event. The whole of the fourth floor and the roof of the building are entirely destroyed, and the lower part much damaged by water. Considerable injury was also done to No. 12, King's Bench Walk; two rooms being greatly damaged by the fire, and other parts of the premises by water. The exertions of the fire brigade happily prevented any further extension of the flames.

RAILWAY DEPOSITS.—The deposit of 8 per cent. on the estimates of all the new railway Bills about to be brought before Parliament was lodged on the 14th inst. to the credit of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery with the Bank of England. The total amount is supposed to be between £1,000,000, and £1,400,000; of which about half was supplied in cash and the remainder in Stock and Exchequer-bills.

From a number of statistics relative to Assurance Companies published in the Assurance News, it appears that since the year 1844, no fewer than 580 companies have been projected, of which 262 have been formed—that during the same period 233 companies have ceased to exist, and that during the year just ended six companies were formed; while eight were merged in other companies, one got into the Bankruptcy Court, and two went into Chancery to be wound up.

"The great task of editing and printing the materials of English History—undertaken by Sir John Romilly" says the Athenæum, "goes on famously. At the end of the year we count no less than twenty separate works, twenty-five volumes, of more or less value, and all original—adding thousands of new details to our knowledge of the historical life of our ancestors. The new year promises to be not less rich than the past."

Lord Brougham has passed through Paris, en route for his seat at Cannes, where his lordship intends remaining until just before the meeting of Parliament.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on all policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should, in order to enjoy the same, make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without imparting to the recipients the risk of co-partnership, as is the case in mutual societies.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are put forth as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,987 10	£6,987 10
1,000	379 10	1,379 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security for the payment of the policy when death arises; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1859, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

Immediate application should be made to the Resident Director, No. 8, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall.

By order,

P. MACINTYRE, Secretary.

PURSUANT to an Order of the High Court of

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JANUARY 26, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Master of the Rolls has appointed Mr. Edward Savage Bailey, Mr. Ralph Barnes, Mr. Alfred Bell, Mr. John Henry Bolton, Mr. William Ford, Mr. Charles Kaye Freshfield, Mr. Henry Lake, Mr. Edward Lawrence, Mr. James Leman, Mr. Edward Leigh Pemberton, Mr. William Sharpe, and Mr. John Hope Shaw, Solicitors, to be the examiners of applicants for admission as solicitors of the Court of Chancery. The same gentlemen, together with Mr. William Stephens, Mr. John Welchman Whateley, Mr. Edward White, and Mr. William Williams, have been appointed the examiners of applicants for admission as attorneys of the courts of common law. It would have been impossible to have appointed gentlemen whose names would have met with more general acceptance in the profession.

It is announced that the Chancery judges have had a meeting to settle the orders of court on the introduction of oral evidence in Chancery causes, and that they will be shortly published. It is rumoured that they will come into force in the course of a few weeks.

After all the various rumours in reference to the appointment to the Chief Justiceship of Madras, vacant by the death of Sir Henry Davison, Mr. Colley Harman Scotland, of the Oxford Circuit, has at length been appointed to that office.

On Wednesday evening last, the benchers of Lincoln's-inn entertained at dinner Colonel Brewster, of the Inns of Court Volunteers. On the following evening, the benchers of the Middle Temple followed the example set them by Lincoln's-inn. On both occasions members of the Inns of Court Volunteer Corps appeared in uniform in honour of their colonel.

Elsewhere in our columns will be found an account of an application for a new trial made to the county court at Rochdale in the case of Maden v. Catenach. We notice it because it appears that on the trial a witness for the plaintiff was interrogated, previously to being sworn, by the advocate of the defendant, as to her belief; and upon her avowing that she believed neither in a God nor in a future state of rewards and punishments, the learned judge refused to allow her to be sworn. As she was the only witness for the plaintiff he was non-suited. It seems doubtful whether the defendant's advocate had a right to question this lady as to her religious belief. There is, indeed, a case at Nisi Prius of R. v. Taylor, Peake Ca. 11, in which the witness seems to have been questioned as to his religious opinions before he was allowed to be sworn; but Mr. Taylor, in his book on Evidence, p. 1121 (3d edit.), says, "A witness is prima facie presumed to hold the common faith of the country, and the ordinary mode of disproving that fact is by furnishing evidence of his declarations previously made to others, the person himself not being interrogated." In support of this proposition he cites a passage from 1 Law Rep., pp. 347, 348 (American), commencing thus:—"The witness himself is never questioned, in modern practice, as to his religious belief; though formerly it was otherwise. . . . The old cases, in which the witness himself was questioned as to his belief, have on this point been overruled. See Christian's note to 3 Bl. Com. 369, n. 30. Is the law as administered at Rochdale, under the authority of Peake, or that laid down by Mr. Taylor, correct? The question is one of considerable importance, and we invite the attention of our readers to it.

At the next meeting of the Law Amendment Society, which will be held on Monday, January 28, at eight o'clock, Mr. Edgar will read a paper on "Some proposed Amendments in the Law relating to Procedure and Evidence on Criminal Trials, including Lord Chelmsford's Indictable Offences (metropolitan district) Bill, Lord Brougham's Plea on Indictments Bill, and Mr. Denman's Felony and Misdemeanour Bill," &c.

THE NEW REGISTRY OF WILLS.

Elsewhere in our columns will be found an account of the arrangements which have been made by Sir C. Cresswell for providing a depository and registry of the wills of living persons. The Times in a leading article upon the subject suggests that some "simple machinery might be established whereby a man might walk into Great Knight-riding-street, and make his will and have it witnessed, and deposited, and registered, just as easily as he might walk into a tavern and eat his dinner." It will be seen by a letter of a correspondent of the same Journal, that it has been suggested that the registrar should be empowered to institute, preliminary to the registration of a will, inquiries as to whether it is actually signed and witnessed in the form which the law requires in order to render the document of legal force. The Times, however, supposes that so simple and useful an arrangement would militate "too extravagantly against the ideas of lawyers." The article in question betrays the same recklessness of assertion and unacquaintance with the subject which of late have characterised the legal leaders of the Times. We are told, for instance, that "nearly half the business of the courts of law hangs upon the blunders made by testators;" and that "for heaps of sterling coin a good will cause is the cause to delight the soul of a respectable solicitor." From such premises, the natural conclusion might fairly be, that one of the first steps of law reform would be to abolish wills altogether, or at all events to prevent if possible their litigious operation. The Times, however, not satisfied with making such foolish and absurd statements arrives at the still more absurd conclusion that the great desideratum of the day is an increased facility for making and establishing wills. The truth is, that it is extremely rare, since the Wills Act, to find a case of any difficulty turning upon the question, whether a will was or was not properly witnessed. Nothing can be more simple than the requirements of the Act, which commend themselves so much to common sense that they are appreciated and acted upon by the great majority even of those who, without professional advice, undertake the task of making their own wills. Nor is it by any means unlikely that although a registrar had the power of deciding beforehand upon the due execution of wills, the same class of persons who now neglect the simple formalities required by the statute would fail to avail themselves of the official aid which it is proposed should be afforded to them. The Times need not be afraid that its scheme will militate "too extravagantly against the ideas of lawyers," if its effect is merely to increase the number of wills, and therefore, of those causes which "delight the soul of a respectable solicitor." It is not pretended that the registrar ought to have power to interfere with the intentions of a testator, or with the language which he chooses to use, for the purpose of carrying them into effect. The only object which could be served by conferring upon the registrar the power of inquiring beforehand into the due execution of wills, would be the simple one of securing such execution. This, however, is of such trivial importance, as to be hardly worth discussing. We have already mentioned that the cases in which this question arises are comparatively rare, and it should be remembered that in the majority even of them, the difficulty obviously arises, not from the ignorance of testators, but from their indecision at the time of making their wills, and from a desire to postpone their complete execution. It is very obvious, moreover, that even if in the nature of things the making of a will were as easy as walking into a tavern, and eating one's dinner, to carry out the idea of our contemporary there ought to be throughout the country as many depositories and registries of wills as there are taverns and chop houses. If every member of the family of John Bull were obliged to have his chop at "Tom's," it would soon become a more difficult thing to dine than suits the stomach of an Englishman; and if every one who makes a will were obliged to attend before an official in Great Knight-riders-street it would probably become necessary as a rule to make one's will at a very early period of life, so as to have some chance of having a turn for an interview with the testamentary official.

The increasing passion for the extension of bureaucratic officialism which exists in this country is one of its most remarkable social phenomena, and Mr. Parkinson's proposal, which furnishes the basis for the platitudes of the Times, is but a new development of this now-a-days national folly. We have had occasion from time to time during the last few years to point out the absurdity of several similar proposals to substitute cumbrous and costly officialism for the private services of professional men. There is no reason why the State should provide for a preliminary inspection of testamentary instruments in the life time of testators. If, indeed, it is thought desirable to impose upon them an official superintendence in the execution of their wills, it would be simply for their own personal benefit, and not for reasons in which the State is much interested. Let testators, therefore, and not the State, make the necessary provision, or at least pay for it; and the only feasible way of making such provision would be by enacting that one of the witnesses to every will should be an attorney or solicitor. Such an enactment would at all events go far towards, and we think would be the best means of, insuring a due compliance with the statutory formalities required in the execution of wills, if that, indeed, be a matter in which the Legislature has any concern.

THE PREPARATION OF BILLS IN PARLIAMENT.

However unpleasant the reflection may be to many an ardent and ambitious legislator, it is nevertheless a necessity from which there is no escape, that all stable and constitutional legislation must depend for its effect upon the capacity of some scribe or other to put the will of the Legislature into such words as will unambiguously convey its meaning. The capacity of the writer of the law determines the power of the Legislature, which can do nothing whatever beyond what it can convey in a verbal expression. It is true that the first draft of a law is subjected to criticism within and without the walls of Parliament, and may be after all, only an occasion for such amendments as may entirely change its tenor and effect; still these amendments have to be expressed, and however multitudinous their authors, their adoption amounts only in the end to this, that one draftsman's work has been substituted for another's. But as a fact of common experience, a Bill that will not in the main pass in the terms and form in which it is introduced, will not pass at all. We must for the most part be content with such expression of the will of Parliament as can be provided in Bills as they are introduced. If Bills are ill prepared, the only alternative at our choice under the ordinary pressure of business is either to pass them with very little critical amendment, or to reject them altogether; in other words, to legislate on the occasion imperfectly, or not to legislate at all. The choice of a draftsman, therefore, in most cases must determine the fate and eventual character of the proposed legislation. The Bills of the Government, even in a constitutional country, where the Government claims no exclusive initiative in legislation, must always bear a large proportion both in bulk and in importance to the whole of the business of legislation. It will, also, necessarily influence to a great extent the character of other contemporaneous legislation; and this more particularly in respect of the form and manner of expression, which, if distinctive any way whatever, will inevitably become the example and standard of expression to the greater number of private draftsmen, whether of Bills or of amendments.

It will be a just occasion for public rejoicing if it should eventually appear, that our Government was alive to the full importance of the step which they took in filling up the vacancy in the office of Parliamentary counsel to the Home Office, caused by Mr. Coulson's death. There is some reason to hope that this is so, more than a month having elapsed before his successor was appointed. The near approach of the meeting of Parliament probably obliged Ministers to have measures which did not admit of much more delay, in some state of preparation.

It was hoped from this delay in the use of their patronage, a delay rarely to be imputed to Ministers, that the Government entertained some plan of a broader and more systematic character than the mere filling up of the vacancy by a fitting successor to Mr. Coulson, at the Home Office. What was really required, and what this vacancy afforded an opportunity of realising, was such an arrangement as would not only provide an able draftsman of Bills for the Home Office and some other Government offices, but effect the far more important and much more neglected object of enabling every member of either House of Parliament to do his work as a legislator with the confidence that Parliament, as a whole, will provide that its decrees, by whomsoever proposed, shall be promulgated with the like securities for their clearness and their reciprocal consistency.

If such be the purpose of the Government, it is manifest that they will require the concurrence of both Houses, by whose resolutions alone any plan having any pretension to meet the exigencies of the case could be brought into operation. The interval before the meeting of Parliament may be well employed in considering what is really required to give to our Legislature all the simplicity, intelligibility, and congruity of which it is susceptible. If the opportunity continues, we propose to make use of it to examine some of the best matured or most favoured plans that have been proposed for the attainment of the desired ends, with a view to aid, so far as we are able, in the selection of the best that present circumstances would allow us to adopt.

VARIATIONS IN EVIDENCE ON CIVIL AND ON CRIMINAL TRIALS.

We noticed last week some important variations in the mode of conducting trials before civil and criminal tribunals, with respect to the addresses of counsel. There are, also, some differences in the methods adopted by these tribunals for arriving at the truth of the matters before them, which appear to call quite as strongly for animadversion. "It has been laid down," says Mr. Broom "that no material difference exists in regard to the rules of evidence, between criminal and civil procedure—that what may be received in the one case may be received in the other, and what is rejected in the one case ought to be rejected in the other—that, in short, a fact must be established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a civil or criminal consequence." This theory is so sensible that it commends itself to common sense. The object in both civil and criminal cases is to arrive at the truth, by whatever consequences that truth may be followed, and the machinery of the process ought in both cases to be the same. The Legislature, however, seems lately to have ignored these principles in England, although strangely enough it has recognised them in Ireland. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ss. 22—27, introduced several very important changes into the law of evidence in civil cases, and these changes have, by subsequent legislation, been applied to both civil and criminal trials in Ireland, while in England they do not extend to criminal trials. Thus it comes to pass, that a deed which may be proved at Nisi Prius without calling the attesting witness, must be proved in a Crown court by the attesting witness. We have, ourselves, seen a prosecution break down, because, a deed requiring to be proved, the witness called to prove it was not the attesting witness—the attorney having, not unnaturally, supposed that the change made by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 26, extended to criminal as well as civil cases, and the prosecuting counsel not having advised upon the evidence. If the brief, however, in this case had been carefully got up, this discrepancy in the law of evidence would not have caused a failure of justice, because the attesting witness might have been called. Still it is difficult to see why the Legislature should place pitfalls in the way of the professors of the law by making artificial distinctions and differences. The other clauses of the statute to which we refer, being framed principally with a view of testing the credit of witnesses, are still more important, and the law laid down in them ought certainly to be imported into our criminal procedure; unless, indeed, we are content to have a more imperfect inquiry on criminal than on civil trials. Diligence would avoid the evils arising from the necessity of calling an attesting witness, because, when once it is known that he ought to be called or his absence accounted for, the difficulty may be met in some way: but when we have admitted that it is important to apply certain tests to the credit of a witness in civil cases, and have acted upon that admission, it seems absurd not to apply the like tests in criminal cases. The absurdity is heightened when it is remembered that the changes to which we have referred have been introduced into the Irish system of Crown law.

Another noticeable discrepancy in the law of evidence was introduced by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 15 (Jervis' Act). Lord Denman's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, s. 1), enacted that no person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of incapacity from interest, from giving evidence. Few persons doubted when that Act was passed—perhaps, no one now doubts—that this change was beneficial. When we are inquiring into the truth of a matter we want all the evidence we can get; and to exclude any part of such evidence by artificial rules is a part of that wisdom of our ancestors which we are doing well to unlearn. The 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 15, however, disqualifies an informer from giving evidence in support of an information before justices, if he has any pecuniary interest in the result of the information—thus repealing, so far, Lord Denman's Act. No doubt the object of the framer of the clause was to discourage common informers, a race of men for whom we have no love. But it is obvious that any common informer whose evidence might be necessary, would have no difficulty in getting the information laid by a third party and sharing the spoils with him. Thus the clause is ineffectual in attaining what can have been its only object, while it remains a blemish in our system of evidence.

The law reforms suggested by these remarks appear to us to be not merely advisable but necessary. Why should they be delayed beyond the approaching Parliamentary session? They are of course beneath the dignity of codifiers and consolidators, but are surely worthy the attention of men who do not despise work which is at once practicable and beneficial.

LIABILITIES BY SPECIALTY AND SIMPLE CONTRACT—ORIGIN OF SEALED DOCUMENTS.

No. I.

Most of the anomalous excrescences of our law have arisen, not from its inherent tendencies to decay or to become unsuited to new complications of civil rights, but partly from a perverse adherence to forms after they cease to fulfil the purpose of their original institution, and partly from an extension of the province of legislative government beyond its proper limits. Amendments and consolidation are the remedies applied from time to time by Parliament, in order to reconstruct the legal machine, and render its old-fashioned implements suited to the present requirements of civil society. But, as consolidation is greatly superior to amendment, so a complete extinction of the cause of intricacy, if consistent with an efficient state of the law, is superior to consolidation. The abolition of all distinction between contracts, except as to their priority in time in certain cases, is a feature of intended law reform that seems to proceed on sound principles, since it both lops off the prerogatives of a custom which prevailed in the early stages of our legal history, only because all men could then seal, but few could sign their names; and also permits men to make their own contracts without legislative or technical aid. Mr. Malins' Bill, some time since presented to the Legislature, goes far to effect this in its abolition of the distinction between debts or liabilities by specialty and by simple contract. In order to show that the distinction sought to be annulled cannot be a requirement of the present condition of our laws, the following account of the origin of sealed documents may be useful. Little need be said as to their legal effect, except to refresh the reader's memory, in order that he may more easily bear in mind the nature of the fictions which we are anxious to see deprived of their present prerogative.

Contracts and debts are, as the reader is probably well aware, divisible by the law of England into two classes, according as the liability is incurred by deed, or is not accompanied by such a formal instrument. A deed, in Latin charta, more usually factum, but in effect equivalent to the stipulatio of the civilians, may be defined to be an instrument of contract written on paper or parchment, which is also sealed and delivered. The absence of any one of these formal items prevents a document from having the legal operation of a deed, and constitutes the liability incurred under it of the order only of simple contract. Thus, though there be written words, sufficient in law to bind a party, and though the document be sealed, yet, until delivered, it is evidence only of a parol contract. A fortiori, written instruments of contract, unaccompanied by further ceremonies, are only evidences of a simple contract liability. They are in law of no more force than so many words spoken would be; however superior in point of expediency a document, "documentum" proof, may be—as embodying with precision the terms of the contract, to a mere oral statement which may in all its terms be with difficulty remembered. A signed document is in some cases also indispensable, according to the Statute of Frauds, as it is also to remove the bar created by the Statute of Limitations; but, even in these cases, the action must be based upon a consideration, just as if no document were necessary. In addition to the characteristics mentioned, certain other legal consequences flow from the fact of a liability having been incurred by deed. These consequences, however, logically considered, are not to be comprised in the definition. They describe, but do not help to define, the essential characteristics of a deed. They are inseparable concomitants of such a contract; but are not as inherent in its nature as writing paper or parchment, sealing and delivery—characteristics which, from the earliest period noted in our legal records down to the present time, have been regarded by the law as the unchanged essentials of a deed. The legal advantages which debts by specialty have over those incurred without deed are as follows:—Specialty debts require no consideration to support an action founded upon them; they are entitled to priority in the administration of assets over simple contract debts; they can be enforced within twenty years, while simple contract liabilities must be enforced within six years; they are also conclusive, and operate by estoppel; and can be only waived or varied at law by deed, while parol contracts are not irrefragable evidence of the truth of their own averments, and may be waived by parol. Judgments and recognizances are sometimes classified by text writers as a third variety of indebtedment or liability. But judgments are not really contracts; they are matter of process, while recognizances are virtually removed from the sphere of civil transactions, being usually entered into only in cases in which the subject contracts with the Crown. But whatever principle of classification may be applied to judgments, recognizances, and all debts of record, it is universally admitted that written and oral contracts are perfectly homogeneous in their legal effect, (7 T. R. 350.)

The origin of a distinct class of debts recognized by the law as entitled to special prerogatives, may be examined either as to the origin of the adoption of the special evidence which such a class imports as containing within itself, or as to the origin and development of its legal privileges. We may inquire concerning the rise of the custom itself or of its legal concomitants. We may proceed either chronologically or logically. The former is the more appropriate ground for our present purpose; while, as the chronological is often coincident with the legal development, the latter will not be meantime wholly removed from our view.

The primary and natural use of the ordinary or external sealing of a document is to preserve the contents of the document secret. Thus the external sealing of wills preserves the secrecy of the dispositions contained in them, and prevents the rise of jealousies among expectant legatees. Now, it is not likely that the custom of primogeniture prevailed in the early or pastoral age, when property consisted only of moveables; and, at all events, children were not generally emancipated by the father and constituted their own masters, during the life of the head or patriarch of the family. Hence it is exceedingly probable, that the father had the power of directing the transmission of his property, even when that came to include real estate, in such proportions among his children as he might choose. It follows, that he would, as far as possible, adopt a secret mode of doing this, in order to prevent unpleasantness in his family. Witnesses, according to this hypothesis, would then be necessary not to evidence the contents of the instrument, but the fact of its execution. A proof that the custom of sealing originated in the desire of secrecy may be derived from the many incidents of deeds recognised by our law, which admit of no other explanation that appears to us equally satisfactory. Thus the ceremony of delivery would seem to imply that originally a third party, either a public functionary or a private arbitrator, was present at all contracts of unusual importance, like the libripens who, under the Roman law, assisted at sales; and that to him, as a stakeholder and depositee of the evidences of title, the deeds were given. That the ceremonious delivery was not the actual transfer of the deed of sale to the purchaser, as one should naturally suppose is shown by the fact, that, while the law strictly enacted the delivery, yet this delivery was not inconsistent at least in our law with the retention of the deed by the grantor. Semble, also, that the delivery may precede the sealing, though it is an experiment by no means to be recommended. The fact also that several parties to a deed may use the same seal on the same wax, goes far to disprove the supposition that sealing was in its earliest origin a mode of signing, which should have been distinctive and definite to be of any use. Corporate and official persons could also use this mode of authenticating documents to distinguish the signature from that given by them to their own private contracts. The frequent use of sealing documents for purposes of secrecy would, however, soon suggest the transference of the seal to the interior of the document, as a solemn mode of giving it authority. Its greater stability and permanence of impression than a bare written signature would soon confirm this application. Such an expedient must have also suggested itself as an especial boon to the illiterate, to which class we owe the prevalence of the custom amongst ourselves. Although morality and honour inculcate equal attention to the fulfilment of all engagements once contracted, and to use deliberation only in making the promise, and not in its performance; yet jurisprudence desires proofs that no undue haste or influence has been used to create a duty of the class of perfect obligations. Hence, the seal would afford a proof of the solemn deliberation of the contracting parties, and would, in addition to all the previous functions, prove the enactment of the solemnity by its own profert without witnesses. This hypothetical origin and development of the custom in its first rise in the East is borne out by the actual development which the legal signification of the ceremony has undergone in our law.

The birth-place of the custom is the East. The practice of thus authenticating documents, which became prevalent on the Continent at the time of the Crusades, is considered to have been introduced—we should say, familiarised—by the pilgrims from Jerusalem. Its antiquity in the East is evidenced by several passages in Holy Writ: Jeremiah, c. 32; 1 Kings, c. 21; Dan, c. 6; Esth. c. 8. A solemn or official signature must have been eminently suited to the tastes of the ceremonious East. That this custom, with other usages of primitive civilization, spread over Europe at a very early period is exceedingly probable. It prevailed under the Roman Empire. The Gothic nations, however, do not appear to have adopted this custom. Thus, the Anglo-Saxons did not generally use seals. The illiterate marked with the sign of the cross. The custom of sealing documents, then, with the other Roman elements and ceremonies of our law, was introduced by the Normans, who were, says Blackstone, a "brave but illiterate nation." Now this custom is to be attributed not so much to their deficiency in learning as to their contact with Roman France. Had the Normans never tasted the remains of Roman civilization in Normandy, they would not have known so useful a custom. But, while its origin was noble, the perpetuation of the custom by the Normans in England was owing to their low state of intellectual culture. Customs long survive the causes from which they have sprung; and this remark is especially applicable to legal customs, which are so often interpreting the present by the light of the past. Records embody, and, therefore, perpetuate customs. Nor, if ceremonies be not complex or abstruse, do we consider their antiquity, and consequently the distinctness of their legal definition, which is in the course of time naturally attained by a series of judicial decisions, an objection to their continuance within bounds discreetly determined. The Roman formula of selling King Porcenna's property by auction was not understood in Livy's time, although it was even then observed. It was an innocent fiction, however, from which no consequences of its own were perversely deduced by the Roman tribunals—a freedom from perversion from which the doctrines we are now discussing can by no means claim.

The most ancient sealed deeds or charters recorded in our law are that of Edwin, A.D. 956, which related to lands in Ely, and that of Offa, whereby he gave the Peter-pence. One of the most ancient sealed documents extant is the charter of Edward the Confessor to Westminster Abbey. Lands could be conveyed in Saxon times without writing, although deeds were sometimes used for that purpose. The Normans introduced seisin, in imitation of the feudal investiture, as an indispensable ceremony to pass an estate in land, and they also generally used deeds in imitation of the breve testatum of the feudal laws: writing, however, was not indispensable until the passing of the Statute of Frauds. The Normans also sealed their written documents and about the period of the reign of Edward the First every freeman had his particular seal. Arms, however, it is confidently stated, were not used until Richard the First introduced them. But this is by no means likely to have been the case among a military people accustomed to flags, banners, and military emblems. A seal itself is ex vi termini an official or distinctive mark. But the use of coats of arms generally only began to prevail from the reign of Cœur-de-Leon. When burghers began to acquire lands by purchase, they used seals as well as the nobility, and hence as the former had no emblazonment to display, sealing degenerated, it is said, into an empty form, all devices becoming obsolete and unnecessary. This may be a true account of the matter, although, if seals were ever used as distinctive signatures, it is hard to see why the law should consider the loss of their essence immaterial. We are strongly disposed to consider the unimportance of the device as indicating that a trace of the original use of sealing—namely, its secrecy—continued to pervade its character in law throughout ages that ceased to know or to interest themselves in its archæology. Moreover, witnesses although generally subscribing their signatures to deeds have never been held necessary for the due execution of these instruments—a circumstance which also goes far to show that the original use of sealing was secrecy, and that this incident of its origin influenced the legal character of the custom among those nations who adopted it. The same inference is also warranted from the fact that several parties might use the same seal. This could never have been the law if sealing in its origin was a signing, which, of course, should be distinctive and definite, but is readily accounted for on the hypothesis that sealing was first used in contracts and dispositions of property as it is now for such virtue as it may possess.

Our account, then, of this custom is that it appears to have first prevailed in its birth-place, the East, for the sake of secrecy; that it was soon transformed into a formality; that as a formality it was transferred by the East to the Romans, who transmitted it as such through their colony, Gaul, to the Normans; and they continued it as a substitute for signature—the ceremony being a convenient cloak for an ignorance of letters. It has been thus perpetuated to the present day as a ceremonious signature to which peculiar advantages are attributed by the law. Its prerogatives over oral or written contracts we have before enumerated, while the fact of its including signature was decided in Cherry v. Heming, 4 Exch. 631; 19 L. J., Exch., 63, which determines that sealing is a signing within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds, or at least, that deeds are not within the purview of that statute.

A deed, then, has always been regarded by our law as the most perfect and solemn form of contract between citizens. At first, it denoted a concluded and conclusive transaction. Afterwards, it was used for bonds and covenants, conventus, contracts of especial solemnity to be performed in futuro. Now, while it is desirable that ceremonies should be held indispensable to evidence the legal completion of a conveyance they can by no means be deemed necessary for contracts to be fulfilled in futuro, as such delays are inconsistent with the expedition necessary to be used in commercial transactions. Inexpedient, then, as any division of contracts into distinct classes, each having peculiar rights, must be considered upon grounds of commercial policy, such a classification, nevertheless, would have occasioned but little complication in our law, if its application was limited to the single point of determining whether the instrument or form of contract in each case were a deed or not. But when the law classified its own inferences by this technical standard, the effect of such a proceeding was, as a general rule, to defeat the intention of the contracting parties.

Thus, when the law, until recently, declared that breaches of trust, although the trusts were created by deed, were, nevertheless, only simple contract liabilities on the part of the trustee, and, therefore, that the cestuique trusts could be indemnified out of the assets of the trustee only in an order puisne to all his engagements under seal, the absurd consequences to which the original distinction of contracts into two classes led are obvious. "Confusion worse confounded" followed also from a threefold division which the law made of covenants themselves into express and implied, real and personal, transitive and intransitive. All this complication originated in the separate use of agreements under seal, unconnected with any actual conveyance. The qualities of a deed were thus imported, according to a legal sliding scale, into all instruments under seal, in proportion as these savoured of the reality, or approximated to the nature of an actual grant as distinguished from a promise. Thus the use of the word heirs in a covenant gave it priority in the administration of the covenantor's assets, over covenants in which the heirs were not mentioned; and this distinction exists to the present time; Richardson v. Jenkins (1 Drew. 477.)

Whether the courts were justified in developing to such an extent the germ of a technical mode of evidence is now too late to inquire. The only question is, whether the extravagant results to which the doctrine has been pushed, may not be better amended by an eradication of the doctrine itself—the fons et origo mali—than by positive legislation applied to exempt special cases from its pernicious operation.

[In a future article we shall endeavour to give some detailed account of the inconveniences which result from the present unscientific classification of debts, into debts by specialty and debts by single contract.]

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn,
Barrister-at-law.

VI. (Continued).

COMPULSORY DOMICIL.

I am supported in my doubts as to the conclusiveness of the decision in Arnott v. Groom referred to, ante p. 199, by the fact that that able judge Lord Jeffery differed from his learned coadjutors, and made some most striking observations upon the reasons for such difference. He regarded the case as one of great nicety, inasmuch as it involved the fact of the matrimonial engagement, an intention in futuro coupled with actual residence. "We are all agreed," he said "that to constitute a domicil there must be the fact of residence at the time of the death and also a purpose on the part of the defunct to have continued that residence."

Where both concur, nothing else is necessary; these are essential requisites, but they are the whole. Now, we have both requisites here. It is said to be quite clear that the lady must be held to have a Scotch domicile at least up to the date of her engagement with the future English husband, or at least up to the time when she went last to England in 1839. I am not entirely of that opinion, that domicile was not that of choice, nor was it that of birth; it was the derivative domicile chosen by her mother, and I am quite clear that such a domicile may be renounced with greater facility than that of birth or individual election; for it is that domicile impressed by the choice of a legal guardian. Consider how absurdly early the pupillarity of females expresses in this country, viz. at twelve years of age. It is hardly to be thought that this lady, as soon as she became a minor pubes, would assert an opinion upon the subject. Her domicile was no longer necessarily that of her mother, which I rather think continued to be Scotch, and the two can no longer be looked upon as the same or as the mother having the power to create the domicile for her daughter. They were only two friends living voluntarily together, independent of one another, and there might have been a radical diversity in the animus of each. Suppose the daughter should have indicated a wish to live out of Scotland, and the mother, seeing that, should break up her establishment, I have very little hesitation in saying that the short residence in Scotland after she came of age would not be held as indicative of her intention to make that country her domicile of choice. I cannot admit what Lord Fullerton assumes to be the rule, that in order to make a domicile it is necessary to have some particular spot within the territory of a law, that is, it is not enough that the party shall have an apparently continual residence there, but shall actually have a particular spot, or remain fixed in some permanent establishment. In considering the indicia of domicile these things are important, but they are not necessary as matters of general law to create a domicile. Many old bachelors never have a house they can call their own; there was the case of a nobleman who always lived at inns, and would have no servants but waiters, but he did not lose his domicile on that account. If the purpose of remaining in the territory be clearly proved aliter, a particular house is not necessary. Suppose a person like Dr. Munroe, (Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Mad. 379), but not having maladies making it hazardous for him to live in his native country, had proposed purchasing a property in the Highlands, and comes home from India without the least intention of returning, pays a visit to the north, and sends notice to have his house put in order, he dies before getting home, could it be doubted that he had acquired his Scotch domicile? * He comes back to Scotland, the country beneath the shade of whose law and within whose bosom he means to die. The purpose of marriage was a serious purpose, it is on the record, and I am not moved by the fact that the marriage might be broken off. The fact is, it was not broken off. Is this purpose not an inducement to change the domicile, though probably the engagement might have been disregarded, especially if there was delay between courtship and marriage. The case which illustrates best the ground on which I go is the case of a person having received an appointment of honour and emolument of a settled and permanent nature in another country, and requiring a residence in that country, but dying before being formally inducted into it or entering upon its duties. Take the case of a person in orders who, receiving presentation to a living in England, sells off his furniture and house here (Scotland), and moves to the south. A certain interval must happen before he can be inducted into his living. He goes to England, spends several months, animus remanendi looking forward to his marriage with the church as the consummation of his felicity, and with the intention of dying at a mature old age in the land of his adoption. But, the ceremony is not performed, and he dies before it can be. I ask if that person shall not be held to have died domiciled in England. The statement of Pothier is express that if a party changes his domicile in consequence of permanent employment, the new domicile attaches to him the moment he comes into the new territory; I think the present case is just like such a spiritual betrothal."

It must be admitted that this case (Arnott v. Groom), was a most singular case, involving elements which rendered a decision upon it a matter of great difficulty, and never, I suppose, was the rule of the necessity of the animus et factum put to so severe a test. The party, by the law of Scotland, which releases females from what is called the state of pupillarity at twelve, and males at fourteen years of age, was, sui juris, to retain or change her domicile as she pleased, and she certainly, by her marriage engagement, made a great advance (though unconsciously) towards doing so; but upon the decisions upon this subject, it is, I think, clear that it was an advance only and not a selection, a contract without taking possession; and although Lord Fullerton's observations were just as to the total uncertainty of the fulfilling of the marriage engagement, yet they appear unnecessary to support the decision come to, for it rested entirely on the ground that anything short of actual permanent residence, coupled with the intention to make it so, could not have changed Miss Stewart's domicile from Scotch to English, assuming that her domicile of origin was lost, and that she acquired that of her only surviving parent. This was another difficulty, if not the chief one in the case, and is a somewhat new feature in the law in that respect. Such a case must, of course, often happen, where a woman becomes widowed with a young family, and is obliged, perhaps, on that very account, to leave her native country and seek under other skies the means of supporting and educating her children upon a scale of reduced expenditure. She would of course, as an independent person, as a feme sole, if she permanently resided in that other country, change her domicile and become domiciled there, and hence it seems quite in consonance with reason that such domicile should be imputed to the children as much as if their father were living and had pursued the same course, for at no time could they follow the domicile of more than one parent, and the act of God has only shifted the power to control the domicile of the minores from one natural guardian to another. With regard to the observations made and the cases put by Lord Jeffery, they are assuredly very powerful and ingenious, but upon examination they seem rather to go to what his notion of the law of domicile is, or should be, than to what it is. I take the rule laid down by all the cases upon this subject to be express, that there must be an actual taking possession, without which no intention, however strong, can prevail; no, not even the starting upon the journey to take possession, for that is the very dying in itinere, so often discussed, and which starting for the intended destination has been held not to operate as a total abandonment of the last domicile. If we look at it in this view, it is an answer to all the cases he puts. Suppose Dr. Munroe had purchased a house in Scotland, but died before he took possession, the very element to constitute the new domicile, namely, the taking possession, would be wanting; and so of the other cases. The question is, not the losing a domicile, but acquiring one; and if we do not acquire, we cannot lose; and as every one has at least a domicile of origin, that becomes his domicile at last, in the absence of all others. Two points then are established by this remarkable case, first that a minor on the death of one parent follows the domicile of the other, and next that an intention, expressed by some act to reside in another country, unless it be coupled with residence in some particular spot of a permanent nature does not, on that minor coming of age, operate as the acquirement of a new one; vid. Robins v. Parton, 6 W. R. 157. I have in a previous part of this chapter adverted to the general law as applicable to a married woman, to which I would now revert for the purpose of inserting some most valuable observations made by two learned Scotch judges upon this subject. The case which gave rise to these was that of Ringer v. Churchill, which occurred in June, 1840, and is reported in the "Decisions of the Court of Session," 2nd series, vol. ii., p. 307, et seq., and they are the more valuable as they were corrected before being printed, by the judges themselves. The circumstances of the case appear in the following extract. Lord Justice Clerk said, "The facts of the case are shortly these:—Both the pursuer and defender are natives of England, where they were married and resided for some years afterwards. In 1822 as it is alleged, the defender Mrs. Ringer left her husband, went abroad, and has been guilty of adultery, especially at Antwerp, in Belgium. The pursuer came to Scotland in 1838, and after he had resided there above forty days, he instituted the present action for the purpose of dissolving the marriage on the ground of adultery, and the defender was fully certiorated (certified) of this proceeding, a copy of the summons having been communicated to her personally while residing abroad. Appearance has been made for her in the action, and defences have been lodged which in pointed terms deny the allegations of the summons and maintain that the defender not having been guilty of the crime of adultery, there is no ground for instituting a process of divorce. A proof having been allowed by which the pursuer alleges that the guilt of the defender is established to have taken place at Antwerp, Lord Fullerton as Lord Ordinary in the cause took the case to report in consequence of the objection having been raised in another case then depending in the court. His lordship reported the cause on the question of the competency of the action under such circumstances, and the point was ordered to be argued before the whole court. The pleas maintained by the defender are, first, that this court has no jurisdiction to give a decree in this action in respect that the defender was not duly domiciled here (Scotland), at the date of the action, and was not personally cited. Secondly, that even assuming her domicile in respect of her husband, still it being merely fictitious, decree of divorce cannot be given on account of acts committed in a foreign country.

* But, see upon this point the case of Attorney-General v. Dunn, 6 M. & W. 511, where a contrary opinion is expressed.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR and the LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.)

Jan. 21.—Cook v. Sturgis.—The circumstances of this case are stated ante, p. 201. An application was now made on behalf of Mr. Commissioner Law to set aside the writ of prohibition granted by Lord Cranworth, when Lord Chancellor, restraining the Commissioner from dealing with certain funds in the Insolvency Court. The case is remarkable for the conflict of jurisdiction between the two Courts. The facts have so frequently been reported that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them.

The Court reserved its judgment.

(Sittings in Banco, before Lord Chief Justice ERLE, and Justices WILLIAMS and KEATINGE.)

Jan. 18.—Erle v. Hopwood.—Champerty.—In this case the plaintiff by his declaration averred that he had, as the attorney of the defendant, advanced large sums of money, and incurred great liabilities, in addition to his costs and charges as an attorney, in enabling the defendant to recover possession of certain estates and property of considerable value; and that he had agreed so to do upon condition that the defendant would pay to him, over and above all legal costs and charges incurred, a sum of money according to the interest and benefit accruing to him from possession of the estates and property, and sufficient to compensate the plaintiff for making the advances, incurring pecuniary liability, and devoting his utmost skill, care, and labour in instituting and carrying on proceedings. That the plaintiff succeeded in recovering for the defendant possession of the whole of the estates, of the yearly value of £8,000. And the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to the sum of £30,000 over and above all his legal charges.

The defendant pleaded payment and satisfaction of the plaintiff's legal costs and charges as his attorney and solicitor, and that the plaintiff had not delivered a signed bill of his demand one month before the action according to the statute. To these pleas the plaintiff demurred.

Shortly after the plaintiff's case was opened,

The CHIEF JUSTICE interposed and stopped the argument. He said the declaration was clearly bad, inasmuch as the money to be paid was to be paid out of what the property recovered realized. It therefore came within the statute of 28 Edward I., chap. 11, against champerty and maintenance of suits. Judgment must therefore be for the defendant.

COURT FOR DIVORCE & MATRIMONIAL CAUSES (Before the JUDGE ORDINARY.)

Jan. 22.—Gurney v. Gurney.—In this case a decree nisi having been made for the dissolution of the marriage,

The Solicitor-General applied that the decree might be suspended to give an opportunity for a future application as to the respondent's property. A petition on the subject had already been presented by Mr. Gurney. The petitioner's advisers had been rather perplexed as to the proper mode of proceeding.

The JUDGE-ORDINARY said there was no precedent as to the practice. No such jurisdiction as that conferred upon him with regard to property had ever been exercised before, and the clause conferring it was most embarrassing. He was called upon to deal with property without any indication of the principles by which he was to be guided. He was navigating a new sea, without either chart or compass. His lordship also complained that the petition set out a long settlement and a will without any abstract of their effect.

The Solicitor-General said that the petition had no reference to the settled property, but to the property which Mrs. Gurney possessed in her own right under a will.

The JUDGE-ORDINARY.—Then, I suppose the settlement was inserted because it was supposed that I might be a person of curious habits, and might like to read it over, although it had nothing to do with the case. His lordship also suggested that some evidence as to the husband's income should be laid before the court. There could not be much difficulty in the matter, as probably the facts were not controverted. The proper course would have been to have included a prayer as to the property, in the prayer of the original petition.

The Solicitor-General.—The petition shall be made more full and more short.

The decree was accordingly suspended.

Jan. 23.—Richards v. Richards and Jones.—An application was made in this suit that under the 40th section of the Divorce Act, 1857, the issues therein might be sent down for trial to the Shrewsbury assizes. The petition was by a husband for a dissolution of marriage. One ground of the application was that, if the case were tried in London in the usual course, it could not come on for hearing before the petitioner was obliged to leave the country. Another ground was that a number of important witnesses lived at Aberystwith, and could not be brought to London without great expense being incurred.

The JUDGE ORDINARY said that the Legislature intended the whole matter to be referred to this Court; but all the common law judges were now judges of this Court. It seemed to him that the meaning of the 40th section was that where questions of fact were in issue, which might be determined at a much more moderate expense in the country than in London, the Court should have power to delegate the trial of those questions in the same manner as the Court of Chancery. A fact so tried, and decided by a jury, would be treated as a fact in the cause. The judge who tried the cause would have power, as in issues directed by the Court of Chancery, to endorse upon the record any special matter that was necessary to be brought to the notice of the Court. It would be much more expensive to try this cause in London than in Shrewsbury.

His Lordship then made the order for the trial of the issues in the cause at Shrewsbury before a special jury.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Jan. 21.—The January adjourned sessions commenced this morning at Clerkenwell, before Mr. Bodkin, Assistant-Judge, Mr. Payne, Deputy, Mr. Pownall, Chairman, and the following magistrates:—Dr. Bateman, Mr. H. Harwood Harwood, Mr. Parbury, Mr. E. E. Antrobus, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Henry White, Mr. Rigg, Mr. Marshall, Sir J. Tyler, Sir C. D. Crossley, Mr. Stacey, Mr. Rankine, Mr. Hogarth, Mr. Arthur Ballantine, Mr. Goodhart, Mr. W. P. Bodkin, Mr. Sambrook, and Mr. Wyatt.

Mr. Serjeant Tozer, of the Norfolk circuit, has been appointed to the vacant recordership of Bury St. Edmund's.

Mr. John Tattersall Auckland, of Eastbourne, Sussex, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, for the county of Sussex.

Mr. Thomas Avison, of Liverpool, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the County of Lancaster.

Mr. George Augustus Bragg, of Moretonhamstead, Devon, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the County of Devon.

Mr. Thomas Bradley Chambers, of Brighouse, York, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the West Riding of the county of York.

Mr. Spencer Murch Cox, of Honiton, Devon, has been appointed Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the County of Devon.

Mr. Anthony Portington, of Alford, Lincoln, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the parts of Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln.

Mr. Robert Lowe Grant Vassall, of Bristol, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the city of Bristol and the county of the same city, also for the counties of Somerset and Gloucester.

It is stated that in pursuance of the rule obtained in the Slave case on Tuesday, the 15th inst., a messenger of the Court of Queen's Bench proceeded on Saturday last from Liverpool by the Cunard steamer for Canada; and that Anderson will be brought over, unless it shall so happen that he has been liberated by the Court of Common Pleas in Canada before the messenger arrives out.

Recent Decisions.

EQUITY.

INSOLVENCY—RIGHT OF SINGLE CREDITOR AS PLAINTIFF.

Davies v. Snell, M. R., 9 W. R. 209.

In Heath v. Chadwick, 2 Phill. 649, Lord Cottenham decided that a creditor of an insolvent could not maintain a suit respecting property belonging to the insolvent and vested in the assignee in insolvency, even though the bill proceeded upon the ground that there had been collusion between the assignee and the party against whom relief was sought. In ordinary cases it would, no doubt, be highly inconvenient that any creditor, or any number of creditors less than the whole, or the insolvent himself, should be able to institute a suit in respect of any property or right belonging to the insolvent—all his rights and property being vested under the Act in his assignees.

In Davies v. Snell exactly the same question arose. The bill was filed by one creditor of an insolvent debtor, after the insolvency, against the assignee of certain property which belonged to the debtor, and which he had, as alleged, fraudulently assigned to this defendant, and also the assignee in insolvency, who had refused to institute a suit except upon being indemnified by the plaintiff, which was impossible on account of the plaintiff's circumstances: he now sued in forma pauperis. "The plaintiff," said Sir John Romilly, M.R., "had no locus standi in this Court; nor could the Court enter into the question whether the assignee had acted rightly in refusing to institute a suit."

Heath v. Chadwick; Kaye v. Fosbrooke, 8 Sim. 28; Major v. Auckland, 3 Hare 77; and other cases, are to the effect that it is as incompetent to the insolvent debtor as it is to one of his creditors to file a bill in respect of his estate. In two recent cases, however, the question as to the right of an insolvent debtor in respect of any surplus which may remain after payment of his debts has been very fully considered in both the Appellate Courts of Chancery. In Dyson v. Hornby, 7 D. M. & G. 1, (1854), 3 W. R. 439; a sum of money belonging to the insolvent's estate was in court, and was more than sufficient for the payment of the debts under the insolvency; and the question was whether it was competent to an insolvent debtor, or any person claiming under him, by proceedings in the Court of Chancery, to intercept the title of the assignee under the insolvency to receive the property of the insolvent; which was decided in the negative, Lord Justice Turner agreeing (Lord Justice K. Bruce, however dubitante) with the Vice Chancellor Stuart, from whose decision the appeal was brought. In Wearing v. Ellis, 6 D. M. & G. 596, Lord Cranworth decided that the devise of an insolvent debtor who had taken the benefit of the Act and obtained a release in full from all his creditors, could sustain a bill in respect of surplus real property, which had been conveyed by the official assignee, without going through the process of applying to the Insolvent Court for an order revesting the property in the assignee of the insolvent. In these cases it was insisted upon in the judgments of Lord Justice Turner and of Lord Cranworth, that the Court of Chancery has nothing to do with the administration of the estates of insolvents. In the last mentioned case Lord Cranworth relied upon the fact that the real estate in question had been got out of the official assignee by his own conveyance, which circumstance distinguishes the case from all the other cases to which we have referred. In Wearing v. Ellis, moreover, the insolvency in truth was at an end, the creditors having all released the insolvent's estate.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

SPECIAL OCCUPANCY.

Reynolds v. Wright, 9 W. R., 211.

A branch of law, in which decisions are neither very numerous nor very recent—that of special occupancy—has been illustrated and settled in a recent case decided by the Lord Chancellor. The proposition newly laid down is this, "that there may be a special occupant of an equitable estate pur autre vie; although the legal estate be in the trustee." This was deduced immediately from the 3rd section of the Wills Act, coupled with the rule that all the sections of the Act, both the new matter, the re-enactments and the consolidation, are to be read together. It seems, indeed, difficult to draw any other conclusion from the language of the 3rd section, but how far ingenious doubts may be thrown upon the meaning of the 6th clause, and of the 12th of the Statute of Frauds, which it repeals and re-enacts, may be found from the report of the case referred to of Reynolds v. Wright. The circumstances of the case were these: Lands were devised to E. S., her heirs and assigns, for three lives, and the life of the survivor. E. S. by will devised this freehold lease to and to the use of two trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, in trust for B., his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. B., who was illegitimate, survived E. S., and died intestate, and without having been married, in the lifetime of the cestuis que vie. The plaintiff claimed the estate as administrator of B., and filed a bill praying for an injunction against the defendants, the executors of E. S.'s will, who had commenced an action of ejectment. The defendants demurred to the bill. The plaintiff, as administrator, appears to have grounded his claim on his alleged character of special occupant. Two points were agreed upon—one, that the estate was an equitable one; the other, that had it been possible for B. to have had an heir, the heir of B. would have taken as special occupant. But, B.'s illegitimacy rendering him unable to transmit any heritable capacity except to his own children, of whom he had none, the administrator claimed to be special occupant, as being expressly mentioned in the original gift. It appears from the report (p. 212), that this was the view adopted by the Master of the Rolls. He held B.'s administrator entitled by special occupancy, and refused the demurrer on that ground. But the Lord Chancellor on appeal distinctly says that in this case there could be and there was no special occupancy. It is observable that the Lord Chancellor, in delivering judgment, cites the limitation to B., as if it were to B., "his heirs and assigns;" whereas in the statement of the report it is found to be to B., "his heirs, sequels in right, executors, administrators, and assigns;" and then proceeds to say that (B. being without an heir) "here upon the death of the grantee of a subsisting estate pur autre vie, there is no special occupant and there can be no special occupant." The reasons why the plaintiff, the administrator of B., did not and could not take in the character of special occupant are not given. Whether, therefore, or not, the decision proceeded on the ground that the word "heirs," occurring in the grant, rendered the word "administrator" inoperative, and mere surplusage, and that, as there could be no heir, the limitation wholly failed—we are left to conjecture. That an executor or administrator as such, is not incapable of taking even a freehold lease as special occupant, is abundantly clear from the cases of Ripley v. Waterworth, 7 Ves. 425; and Fitzroy v. Howard, 3 Russ. 230, and may be inferred from the language of the Wills Act itself. In the present case the administrator though he failed on appeal, in his character of occupant, was held to have succeeded under the clause in the Act of Parliament, and thus the decision of the Master of the Rolls was upheld. The Wills Act provides that "in case there shall be no special occupant of any estate pur autre vie, it shall go to the executor or administrator of the party that held the estate thereof by virtue of the grant." In this case, the Lord Chancellor held that there was no special occupant, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the property by virtue of the statutory right.

To meet the case which the plaintiff thus, in the end, succeeded in establishing, the defendants were put to great difficulties. Their main contention was that they had the legal estate in themselves; that there could be no special occupancy of an equitable estate, consequently that the plaintiff had no locus standi in equity. Another argument was of this kind. They relied upon an opinion expressed by the Master of the Rolls, to the effect that under the Wills Act, they, the defendants, must fail, but that it was a question whether the plaintiff could have succeeded under the Statute of Frauds. If that were so, they said that the words upon which his Honour decided the case were the same in both statutes; viz., the following:—"And if no such devise thereof be made, the same shall be chargeable in the hands of the heir, &c., as assets by descent." Here no devise was made, and there was no heir; consequently the holders of the legal estate claimed to be entitled for their own benefit. The clause, "in case there be no special occupant thereof," they argued, must be held to mean, in case no special occupant were pointed out in the grant, that is to say, in case there were no words of limitation in the grant at all. To these arguments it was answered that the Wills Act proves special occupancy to apply to equitable estates. Secondly, the observation of the Master of the Rolls referred to the well known circumstance that there was a casus omissus in the Statute of Frauds which the Wills Act was intended to remedy; finally it was argued, though as it turned out erroneously, by the plaintiff, that he was a special occupant. It is somewhat remarkable that in a note to Jones v. Goodchild, 3 P. Wms. 33, the point involved in this case was anticipated and discussed by the learned reporter more than a century ago. He puts the case of a church lease for three lives given to a bastard and his heirs, and then the bastard dying intestate and without issue; what, he asks, becomes of the lease? Does it go to the administrator of the bastard? or to the Crown? or does the limitation to the heirs make any difference? or is it casus omissus out of the Statute of Frauds? or lastly, is the lessor entitled on the principle that the lease is determined? To these queries we are now enabled to answer, that the estate does go to the administrator of this bastard, not, however, by law but by modern statute; that the limitation to the heirs is material; and that the casus omissus in the Statute of Frauds, if it would have applied to this case at all, is now remedied by the statute of 1 Vict. c. 26. It seems highly probable that this is among the last cases upon this subject which can come before the Courts. The decision that equity follows the law in the case of special occupancy appears to bring within the purview of the Wills Act any possible description of an estate pur autre vie. Even the very artificially conceived cases, stated in Peere Williams, has now, in the natural course of events, actually occurred in practice, and been settled by judicial decision.

COMMON LAW.

JURISDICTION OF MAGISTRATES — SUMMARY CONVICTION FOR AN AGGRAVATED ASSAULT — 16 & 17 VICT. C. 30, s. 1.

In re Thompson, 9 W. R. Exch. 203.

In this case an important and interesting question was discussed, with regard to the proper administration of the law by which outrages on the person are punished. And it will be seen that the Court of Exchequer are not of one mind as to the consequences of evidence being given on a charge before justices of assault and abuse, establishing that the crime of rape had been in fact committed by the person charged on the woman assaulted.

The point did not come under the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved (the usual tribunal for the clearing up of doubtful parts of the criminal law), but arose in the Court of Exchequer, on a motion for a habeas corpus to bring up the body of a prisoner who was confined in consequence of his conviction for an aggravated assault, by justices at petty sessions. The proceeding before the magistrates was taken on an information which charged the defendant with having unlawfully assaulted and abused one A. T.; and after the case for the prosecution had been opened by the attorney employed, the attorney for the person charged raised an objection that the facts charged would (if proved) establish the crime of rape to have been committed, which would oust the jurisdiction of the justices. This objection was overruled; evidence to the effect above suggested given by the prosecutrix; and the person charged was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, as for an "aggravated assault," under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 1; which allows assault upon females of such an aggravated nature as not properly to be dealt with by the infliction of a fine of £5, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 29, to be punished summarily by the magistrates with a larger fine or with imprisonment, (with or without hard labour) to the extent of six months. It was, in support of the conviction, now contended that the word "abuse," in the information above referred to, might be treated as surplusage, and being so treated, that the prisoner was lawfully convicted of an aggravated assault, under the above statute; while, on the other side, it was insisted that the word "abuse" was material, and showed that something had been done beyond an assault, and that consequently the magistrates had no jurisdiction. On this point the Court were equally divided, and the grounds of this discrepancy will appear from the following breviate of their judgments.

The Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Wilde were both of opinion that the conviction was bad. They remarked that the provision in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, was an extension only with regard to the punishment, of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27, in which the expression used was a common assault, i.e., an assault not accompanied by any circumstances which gives to the assault the distinctive character of an intention to commit a crime such as rape, murder, and the like. The expression used in the later Act "aggravated assault" referred, they thought, only to a common assault of a violent and severe kind, not to one complicated with an intention to commit a specific crime. For over the latter species of assaults magistrates have no jurisdiction and ought to send the case for trial at the sessions or assizes. We are of opinion further that the charge itself (in the case now before the Court), that of assaulting and abusing, shows that the magistrates had no jurisdiction, and the accuracy of the charge was borne out by the evidence given. To allow the magistrates after this to proceed, would, on the one hand, be allowing them to send a man to prison for six months with hard labour under circumstances which he has a right should be inquired into by a jury; and on the other, permitting them to pardon the offence of rape (for no further proceedings can be taken against the offender), by treating the matter as a common assault. If it is to be allowed that magistrates should shut their eyes to one part of a charge in order to give themselves jurisdiction, there is no offence however serious, even up to the crime of murder, which may not in this manner be withdrawn from the consideration of the proper tribunal.

On the other hand, Barons Bramwell and Channell came to the opposite conclusion; and held the conviction to be good. Had the charge indeed been one of rape, the magistrates should simply have dismissed it or committed the person charged for trial, and could not have convicted him of an assault; and the case would have been the same had the charge been of having committed an assault with intent to kill, ravish, or the like; but the charge was that of assaulting and abusing, and the latter term has no technical meaning (for the present purpose) confining it, when used in reference to a woman, to sexual intercourse with her. It is a proof of this, that in 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, where the word is used in connection with the crime of rape, the word "carnally" is added. This word therefore in the charge with which the magistrates dealt, may properly be rejected altogether, as having under the circumstances—the woman being of full age—no meaning whatever. Hence the charge brought before the magistrates was a charge of assault, with which, under the statute, they were competent to deal; and with which they did deal, though probably they came to a wrong conclusion on the evidence, and should have committed the prisoner for trial for the offence of rape. But, in point of law, it is possible to suppose them to have discredited the evidence so far as it tended to establish the crime of rape, and to have believed only such as showed that a common assault of an aggravated kind had been committed. On this ground the conviction should be supported.

It may be remarked that the Chief Baron in comparing the statutes of Geo. 4 and Vict., appears to have been inaccurate in one respect. The provision in the earlier statute only allows the justices to inflict a fine to the extent of £5, or, in default, imprisonment for two months (not three as stated in the judgment). The Act of Victoria differs not only in allowing a larger fine (£20) to be imposed, but also allows the punishment to be either by imprisonment or fine at the discretion of the justices. This distinction between the two Acts, perhaps, somewhat weakens the argument of the Chief Baron, so far as it depends upon the assaults intended by the later Act being aggravated assaults of the same character, as those referred to in 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 27.

It may further be observed that one difficulty which seems to have been felt by those barons whose opinion was in favour of the conviction, was as to how they could consistently with the decision of the Queen v. Bolton (1 Q. B. 66), review upon affidavits the judgment of the magistrates upon the facts brought before them in evidence, so as to separate the evidence as to an assault from the evidence as to a rape. The decision came to in the case referred to, was that where there was a conviction regular in form and practice, and in a case over which the justices clearly had jurisdiction, the Court of Queen's Bench will not interfere or look at affidavits impeaching the correctness of their decision. But (as remarked by the Chief Baron) neither does that case nor any other authority prevent the Courts at Westminster from considering the question of jurisdiction on affidavits or otherwise.

The construction to be put upon the words "in arrear and unpaid" must be a literal one; and if the rent-charge is in arrear and unpaid for twenty-one days, the owner may distrain after giving ten days' notice to the tenant in possession.

By the 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 71, s. 81, it is enacted that in case the rent-charge is in arrear and unpaid for twenty-one days next after any half-yearly day of payment, it shall be lawful for the person entitled to the same, after having given or left ten days' notice in writing at the usual or last known residence of the tenant in possession, to distrain upon the lands liable to the payment, &c., for the arrears of rent-charge, as for arrears of rent reserved on a common lease for years—with a proviso that not more than two years' arrears shall at any time be recoverable by distress.

By the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93, s. 29, the owner of the rent-charge is entitled to 2s. 6d. in respect of each notice; and by s. 30, the notice may be given in the manner provided by the therein recited Acts (of which the above is one) or the notice may be sent by the post in a registered letter to the office or usual place of abode of the person to whom it is addressed.

Your correspondent, "A Subscriber," confounds the remedy by distress for rent with the remedy by re-entry for a forfeiture accrued by its non-payment, as it is in the latter case only that, in general cases, an actual demand of the rent must be made upon the land by the person entitled or his immediate agent.

C.

The 23rd & 24th Vict. c. 93, in no way affects the mode of recovering a tithe rent-charge. It merely facilitates the service of the notice required by the 81st section of the 6th & 7th

Will. 4, c. 71, and authorizes a charge of 2s. 6d. to be made for it.

Beyond this notice, I take it that no demand of any kind is legally necessary to entitle the owner of the rent-charge to distrain.

I think "A Subscriber" has not sufficiently considered that although the 67th section of the Tithe Commutation Act speaks of the sum payable in lieu of tithes as "in the nature of a rent-charge, &c.," it also goes on to provide a special mode for its recovery. This is contained in the 81st section:—"In case the said rent-charge shall be in arrear and unpaid for the space of 21 days next after any half-yearly day of payment," it shall be lawful to give the notice before referred to and distrain.

It appears clear to me therefore that the rent-charge is "in arrear and unpaid" the moment after it becomes due, without any demand of payment having been made, and consequently that at the expiration of 21 days, the tithe owner may proceed to give the required notice and distrain.

APPOINTMENT OF NEW TRUSTEES OF CHAPELS, &c.

Can you or any of your readers inform me whether there has been any decision upon the construction of the 13th & 14th Vict. c. 28, which vests property held for religious or educational purposes in new trustees without any conveyance, the appointment being merely evidenced by a short deed according to the form given in the schedule to the Act. Mr. Lewin does not mention this Act in his Treatise on the Law of Trusts and Trustees.

The Provinces.

ROCHDALE.—At the sitting of the Rochdale County Court, on the 23rd inst., Mr. E. J. H. Craufurd, barrister, (instructed by Mr. Z. Mellor, town clerk of Rochdale), applied for a new trial in the case of Maden v. Catenach, which was heard at a previous court. Mrs. Maden was the daughter of the defendant, and her husband sued for a piano, valued at £6. On Mrs. Maden getting into the box to give evidence, on the former hearing Mr. Standring, solicitor for the defendant, asked if she believed in a God, and in a future state of rewards and punishments. Mrs. Maden replied in the negative; and thereupon his Honour (C. Temple, Esq.) non-suited Mr. Maden, with costs. The learned counsel having now put in an affidavit, setting forth on the part of Mr. Whitehead (solicitor on the former hearing), what then took place, made a long statement, and cited a number of authorities maintaining that in British courts of law, where a plaintiff's own rights were concerned, the law did not permit an inquiry into his religious belief, and therefore on that ground did not permit an objection to his suit. What the law did was this; it stepped in in such cases when the rights of others were concerned.—His Honour remarked that in a case like that he had not the slightest wish to close the mouth of any one. A non-suit was accepted, and the opposite side asked for costs, and, as a matter of course, he gave them. It was not correct that the Court, on its own motion, had taken the interrogatories into its own hand, and then awarded costs.—Mr. Craufurd then briefly asked for a new trial.—Mr. Standring having opposed the application, his Honour gave judgment: The case, he said, came before him simply on the ground that he had committed a mistake in the law of the land, and that a witness to whom objection had been taken, had been improperly refused to be allowed to give her testimony. Now, his object on all occasions was to perform his duty, in the administration of the law, in a fair and impartial manner. In that case he could not be charged with any prejudice in the matter, for he knew nothing of the parties until they came before him; nor did he learn the position the case had assumed until weeks afterwards, when, as they might guess, some one was good natured enough to send him the public papers. The learned counsel had said that the question was one of common law, and that that law was elastic, and not to be judged with the strictness of olden times. He admitted that in a degree, but not to the extent of the learned counsel's argument. The common law was elastic as regarded the circumstances and changes of society, but not as applied to a principle. The common law in such a case as this, as he had gathered from Justice Buller, was, that a witness must believe in the existence of a God, in the obligation of an oath, and in a future state of rewards and punishments, so as to secure or imply a responsibility to God for the truth of the evidence given. The oath, as now given, concludes with the words, "So help me God." The old form concluded with the words, "So help me God on his holy doom or day of judgment." That was no doctrine of his; it was the law, and he had no power to alter it. He had simply administered it, and as the Legislature had acknowledged that to be the common law, he could not meddle with it. His Honour then cited the case of Gmichund v. Barker, and the opinions of Lord Coke, Chief Justice Hale, and others; and concluded by refusing to grant a new trial, and gave costs to the opposite party.

Ireland.

THE PROFESSION AND LANDED ESTATES COURT.

The Australian Land Registration plan does not appear to find favour with the lawyers, whatever may be its merits in the eyes of economists. Probably the profession in Australia consider it a rash attempt to put an end to conveyancing; and they know that land does not resemble government stock, and cannot be assimilated to it, or treated like it. It may be that in a newly civilized country, where society is young, sales and mortgages constitute the whole transactions in land: but it will be soon discovered in our flourishing colony, that the exigencies of property and of family will render settlements of all kinds necessary—the "paternal estate" will become valuable, beyond money value, even to the Australian. The essence of feudalism must eventually re-appear in British society, even at the Antipodes. Then it will be owned that estates do not resemble the Three per Cents in any degree whatever. We take it that the lawyers there are alive to these considerations, and therefore view Mr. Torrens and his complete-looking schemes with some suspicion.

But as a parallel has been drawn, and will continue to be drawn, between the new registration system in Australia, and the system of parliamentary title which has been in force in the Incumbered or Landed Estates Court (as it is now called) in Ireland, for some ten years past, it may be well to show how far the latter system interferes with the profession in Ireland, and in what light they regard it. In order that this may appear, we must look back into the history of the Incumbered Court, to its foundation under the Act of 1849.

Many old heads thought that Act somewhat revolutionary, and repeated the old question, "Suppose this Court should sell the estate of A., grant it with parliamentary title to B., and with the proceeds pay off the debts of C.?" It required some three or four years of steady working experience to show them that if the machinery is entrusted to cautious, learned workmen, and if a great publicity is given to all their proceedings through advertisement, and otherwise by the press, such accidents cannot occur, and such fears are groundless. If itinerant commissioners had indeed gone from one county to another, selling off all before them, in haste, mischief enough might have ensued. But the Act was worked by three grave and prudent lawyers, the senior of whom was a Baron of the Exchequer; and if the machine moved with some of the rapidity, it moved with all the exactness, of a steam-engine. Total security against fraud and mistake was found in a well devised paraphernalia of abstracts, deeds, certificates, affidavits, Ordnance surveys, maps, rent rolls, certificates, and postings in the newspapers.

The solicitors of Ireland immediately after the Act passed began to revive, in a new and unexpected manner, hundreds of old chancery suits which had been dead or languishing in their offices for years. Within a year from the opening of the new Court, five hundred petitions were lodged, relating to estates which had been the subject of chancery proceedings. In some cases, the suits had abated and had not been revived; in some decrees had been made, and tedious enquiries were being made, or were supposed to be made, in the masters' offices. In some, decrees for sale had been pronounced, but no purchasers could be found. In some, purchasers had found out incurable flaws in title, and were seeking to abandon their purchases. In many, one purchaser had been discharged, and no other had appeared. In all, there was no efficient ownership, no proper management, and the estates were virtually bankrupt. For a long time, then, the solicitors were engaged in winding-up these cases, under the new system. The properties were sold after full inquiries into title, the conveyances executed, and the funds distributed to the creditors; no inconsiderable sums being paid away in discharge of chancery costs long overdue, but for which there had been no available fund. On the hospital being opened, the worst cases rushed in first. But the business soon began to alter in its character.

Solicitors then began to appreciate the benefit of a system which, in fact, made land a marketable commodity. Some of their clients had moneys to invest. Instead of buying shares or stock, they found it better to buy land, knowing that in case of need they could immediately re-sell. Land became a commodity easily bought, and readily sold. All the spare money in the country, in fact, came through the solicitors' hands in this way. If land had been unattainable, and the stocks the only eligible investment, it would have gone through the stockbrokers' hands. In an old country every one likes to buy land—if he can; every one looks forward to the time when he can saunter round his own fields, as one of the best hopes of this life. The solicitors found that every transaction, of the thousands that now took place, brought them some employment and some profit. The few heavy transactions in the year had been substituted by a hundred smaller ones; smaller, indeed, but on the whole more profitable, and accompanied by more prompt payment. In 1857, the entire profession concurred in the absolute necessity of rendering the court a permanent institution of the country, and of enlarging its jurisdiction, so as to enable short terms of years and life-estates (theretofore excluded) to be sold, and also estates free from incumbrance. With the full concurrence of the Law Society, and of the entire profession, was passed the Act constituting the "Landed Estates Court" permanent, and giving it largely increased jurisdiction.

Here we must refer to two important matters, in which the Law Society was obliged to interfere, but in both of which that interference was followed by the best results. In 1858 came out the new code of rules. They were complicated, and tended to keep business away from the Court, and to send foreclosure and partition suits à la into the Court of Chancery. The Law Society sent a deputation to the judges of the Court to represent the injustice and impolicy of frightening away vendors and other suitors, by a cumbrous mode of procedure. The then senior judge (the author of the code in question) and his colleagues declared the code an experiment only; and in July, 1859, it was wholly abolished, and a more simple and rational mode of procedure finally established. The other point is that of the schedule of costs of proceedings, which after much consideration by the Court, aided by the Law Society on the part of the solicitors, were revised, and so finally settled as to give to practitioners a fair and sufficient remuneration.

The present state of the land system of Ireland is shortly this, that solicitors generally advise their clients to transact their business as vendors, and as purchasers of land, through the Landed Estates Court; and also resort to it largely for partitions and other purposes. It is not too much to say, that when the Treasury consents to lower the duty on proceedings (in lieu of court fees), which is now on too high a scale, all the land business of the country will be transacted by solicitors through the medium of that Court. It has long been surmised, but it is now demonstrated, that, under a good system, the interests of the solicitors are identical with those of their clients.

TALK OF THE FOUR COURTS.

The vacancy on the bench of the Court of Exchequer, occasioned by the retirement, through ill health, of the Right Hon. R. W. Greene, is not yet filled up. The delay is attributed partly to the absence of the Lord Lieutenant in England, but a more important obstacle is probably as follows:—The Attorney-General (Deasy) enjoys a seat in Parliament for the county of Cork, but by no means a safe seat, as a troublesome and costly opposition is anticipated at the next election; and this being the case, Serjeant Deasy is not unwilling to claim his undoubted right to promotion; but the other law officer not being in Parliament, the Government are most anxious to retain the valuable services of their Irish Attorney-General during the coming session, and would also be not unwilling (for once) to consider legal rather than political merits, and elevate Mr. Brewster, for many years the leader at the Bar, to the Exchequer. So stands the dilemma.

The calls to the Bar this term have been six only. Calls to the Bar now average only fifteen a year, whereas, twenty years since, more than sixty new barristers were added to the list every twelve months. The law seems to have ceased to be a favourite profession; and the Indian Civil Service and Woolwich are found to draw off most of the promising young men in the University. Perhaps the rising importance of the County or Quarter Sessions Courts, in which the business is chiefly transacted by attorneys, and consequent diminution of the number of records for trial at Nisi Prius, has something to do with this singular falling off in the number of admissions to the Bar.

The attorneys practising at Quarter Sessions form a very numerous body, and are beginning to feel that their interests are endangered, and require looking after. They have special causes of complaint of their own, more particularly as regards inadequate schedules of fees, and arbitrary rules and restrictions which some of the chairmen of counties have made to their prejudice. Hence the formation, last week, of a Society of Practitioners at Quarter Sessions, independent of the Incorporated Law Society. The latter Association is, however, very unwilling that a second Society of Attorneys should exist, and accordingly sent a deputation to the meeting, when the new one was organised, to recommend a "fusion." Deputations have been appointed by both, and matters will shortly be discussed between them; and perhaps, after all, there may be no separate Association of Sessions Attorneys, and the Law Society may be strengthened in numbers, and rendered more efficient in its exertions to protect the interests and promote the welfare of the profession.

ON THE BANKRUPTCY LAW OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

(Conclusion.)

Having settled who may become bankrupts, the proceeding for obtaining adjudication or sequestration does not greatly vary in the two countries. In both, the form is by petition to the Court, either at the instance of the debtor himself, or of a creditor or creditors whose debts amount to sums which are at present the same both in England and Scotland, although by the Attorney-General's Bill it was proposed to make the sums a little less than they now are in Scotland. It is to be observed, however, that in England, under the Act of 1849, a petition for adjudication at the instance of the trader himself, was not entertained unless the petitioner could make it appear to the satisfaction of the Court that his available estate was sufficient to pay his creditors, at least, 5s., in the pound. But by the subsequent Act of 1854 (17th & 18th Vict. c. 119), this is so far modified, and the petition is not subject to dismissal, if it be made to appear that the available estate is sufficient to produce the sum of £150. There is no such restriction in Scotland, and the Attorney-General's Bill did away with it for England. It is questionable, however, whether under the present system in Scotland too great facility is not afforded to obtain the benefit of sequestration. It not unfrequently happens that the estates sequestrated are not equal to bear the expenses, and still more frequently that no dividend, or one which is merely nominal, can be paid out of them. No doubt the statute renders it competent for the creditors in such cases to resolve that the bankrupt shall only be entitled to apply for and obtain a decree of cessio, and shall have no right to a discharge in the sequestration; but creditors are rarely disposed, when the matter is left to them, to enforce an unfavourable law against bankrupts; and since the passing in 1856 of the statute containing the above enactment, no case is known to have occurred in which the creditors have availed themselves of the power so given to them. It might be an improvement, as has been suggested by Mr. Eason, the Accountant in Bankruptcy, to empower the judge, when circumstances seemed to him to call for it, to declare that the bankrupt shall have no right to a discharge, but only to a decree of cessio bonorum, under which, though his person would be protected, his future acquisitions would not be liberated. It seems pretty certain that as the law now stands, the tendency is not so much to surround with unnecessary impediments the obtaining of sequestration and subsequent discharge, as to make it too easy for all sorts of bankrupts to become independent of their creditors. At the same time, it is always a delicate matter for a judge to take upon himself the initiative against a litigant. He ought to be put in motion by some person interested, so that he may never himself be in the position of a party. If the creditors, who are chiefly concerned, choose to remain supine, a judge can hardly be called upon to put himself into their shoes, and to do at his own hand what he is not asked to do.

An evil of another description has sprung up of late, which was particularly felt by the creditors of English bankrupts, and for which it has been deemed necessary to seek a remedy. Finding that subjection to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Bankruptcy Courts followed from residence for a period of forty days, coupled with the requisite indebtedness, it occurred to many English insolvents that they might get their affairs disentangled at such a distance from their own proper creditors as would make it difficult for them to offer any opposition, or look narrowly into the character of the surrender. A good many experiments of this kind were accordingly made, and in most instances successfully; but an outcry soon followed, and the scandal became too notorious to be tolerated longer. By the Lord Advocate's Amendment Act of last session it is now provided that, whenever it shall appear to the Court of Session or Lord Ordinary, upon a summary petition by the accountant in bankruptcy, or other person interested, at any time within three months after the date of the sequestration, "that a majority of the creditors, in number and value, reside in England or Ireland, and that from the situation of the property of the bankrupt, or other causes, his estate and effects ought to be distributed among the creditors under the bankrupt or insolvent laws of England or Ireland," the sequestration may be recalled. It is believed that this enactment will go far towards putting an end to the above class of alien sequestrations; and although it has been asked why the evil should not have been met on the presentation of the petition, and before the granting of sequestration, and why English and Irish creditors should still be exposed to the inconvenience of following the debtor for a period of three months in the Scotch Courts, it will be seen upon reflection that it would be exceedingly difficult to make the proper distinctions ab initio, and to ascertain the true position of the applicant before certain judicial steps had been taken, and at least some of the creditors brought into the field. It may be true that in the general case prevention is better than cure, but prevention is not always possible, and the certainty that an evil will be got rid of when it occurs, frequently stops its occurrence. A somewhat different remedy was proposed by the Attorney-General's Bill, viz.:—"That the Scotch Courts should have power at any stage of the proceedings, 'on cause shown,' to transfer the insolvents and their estates to the English Court of Bankruptcy, there to be dealt with according to the law of England. The difficulty here, however, consisted in fixing what should be held to be a sufficient 'cause' for making the transference. One of the grounds enacted in the Bill, namely, that a majority in value of the creditors were resident, or carried on business in England, was evidently inadequate, as the bankrupt might be truly a Scotch trader, though at the time of his insolvency the largest proportion of his debts was due to persons in England. If this difficulty could be adjusted, the provision might be considered not inconsistent with, but only supplementary to, that of the Lord Advocate, although it would be rather anomalous to regulate in a purely English Act procedure in a Scotch court.

As soon as the adjudication of bankruptcy or a sequestration has passed, the first question which arises is, what is to be done with the bankrupt estate? how is it to be preserved? and who is to take possession of it? The theory of the law in both countries is, that it is to be held as vested in a neutral party or parties for behoof of the creditors; but there is a difference in the manner in which this is effected. In Scotland a trustee, chosen by the creditors themselves, takes the whole estate as soon as his election is confirmed by the court, and the act and warrant of confirmation is declared ipso jure to transfer to and vest in him, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole property of the debtor. But, in point of fact, whatever retrospective effect his appointment may have, the trustee cannot take the property till he becomes trustee, and even when there is no competition for the office, a period of from twelve to sixteen days necessarily elapses between the sequestration and confirmation; and if there be competition, the time may be much longer. To avoid the inconvenience arising from this interregnum, and the possible dilapidation of the estate, various expedients have been resorted to. For a considerable period, both under the Act of 1814 (54th Geo. 3, c. 137), and of 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 41); an intermediate officer, called an interim factor, was elected by the creditors, who held the bankrupt property till relieved by the trustee. As the interim factor, however, could not be so elected any sooner than the trustee now is, his election was taken from the creditors by the Act of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 53), and the Lords Ordinary were empowered, in awarding sequestration, to appoint at the same time an interim factor, or to remit to the sheriff of the county to do so. The lords ordinary themselves exercised the power thus given to them; and if satisfactory appointments could have been always made, the desired result of avoiding any interval during which the bankrupt estate is in no one's hands would have been attained. But it was impossible that their lordships could be personally acquainted with the most fitting persons to be appointed in the different localities; and as the best class of professional men did not choose to come forward as candidates, the plan was not found to work well, and was abandoned. Under the Act of 1856, now in operation, the office of interim factor has been abolished, but the court (whether supreme or local) to which a petition for sequestration is presented, is empowered, either with or without "special application by a creditor," to take immediate measures for the preservation of the estate, either by the appointment of a judicial factor, or "by such other proceedings as may be requisite." Power is also given to the sheriff, "upon cause shown by any creditor, or without any application, if he shall see fit, at any time after the sequestration, and before the election of a trustee, to cause to be sealed up and put under safe custody the books and papers of the bankrupt, and to lock up his shop, warehouse, or other repositories, and to keep the keys thereof till a trustee is elected and confirmed." These provisions would meet the difficulty if a creditor would always come forward to get them put in force; but it is found in practice that individual creditors are seldom inclined to take the responsibility of petitioning on their own shoulders; and the sheriff, unless applied to, cannot know when it may be expedient to exercise, proprio motu, the power given to him. In England the appointment of an official assignee always accompanies an adjudication of bankruptcy; and the estate being immediately looked after by that functionary, is never left in the anomalous position in which it commonly is for a shorter or longer time in Scotland.

Whilst one advantage is thus gained, the larger and more important question is at the same time raised, how far it is expedient to call in the aid of official assignees at all? In Scotland we act upon the principle that as sequestration sets aside the whole estate for behoof of the creditors, they are the parties who should have the choice of the individual to take possession, realize, and divide it. We have, therefore, no official list of persons specially appropriated for the office of trustee, the creditors being, on the contrary, left entirely free to elect the party, professional or non-professional, whom they consider best qualified to protect their interests. In England a permanent body of about thirty official assignees, appointed by the Lord Chancellor, have what may be termed a monopoly of the custody of bankrupt estates, for as soon as an adjudication takes place one of the number steps into possession with full powers; and it is worthy of remark that in London this is done through the operation of the ballot, a particular official assignee not being appointed to each estate by the court, or taken in rotation from the list, but fixed on simply by chance. Creditors' assignees are afterwards chosen to act with the official assignee; but the assets of the bankrupt estate remain with the latter alone, who substantially exercises throughout the chief control. This double vesting, as it were, of the bankrupt property, in parties differently appointed, but who exercise to a certain extent co-ordinate powers, is a system which has been in operation only since the passing of the 1st & 2nd Will. 4, c. 56. Before then, persons called "provisional assignees" were appointed in each particular case, and the estate was provisionally assigned to them by the commissioners; but they assigned it again to the creditors' assignees as soon as they were appointed. The Attorney-General's Bill brings back matters substantially to this state. "It has been justly complained," he said, "that the official assignee reduces the creditors' assignee to a mere cyphor; that he usurps all his functions; and that the creditors are, as it were, through their appointed organ, displaced and removed from their proper position." The Attorney-General's proposal, therefore, was, that if the creditors selected as their own assignee a different person from the official assignee (whom, however, they were to have a right to choose if they preferred him), the official assignee was to render to the creditors' assignee a full account of all his receipts and disbursements, and to hand over the whole of the property of which he had taken possession, and his functions were then to cease, except that he was to remain in the position of auditor of accounts of the creditors' assignee. Under the present system, the official assignees are paid by liberal fees and percentages out of the bankrupt estates; whereas the creditors' assignees act gratuitously. A considerable diversity of opinion exists in England as to the propriety of continuing or abolishing the office of official assignee. To us in Scotland it appears inexpedient—1st, That two persons, holding their appointment from different sources, should be responsible for the discharge of a duty which could be equally well done by one; 2nd, That a person nominated by the court, who may or who may not have the confidence of the creditors, should virtually override the officer selected by them; and 3rd, That the one assignee should be largely remunerated, while the other receives no remuneration at all.

In Scotland, creditors have never any difficulty in securing the services of a duly qualified trustee, who is commonly chosen from among the respectable professional accountants now to be found in all commercial towns. If there be competition for the office, which not unfrequently happens, the sheriff hears parties summarily, and his decision declaring the successful candidate is final. A committee of two or three creditors, who, on appointment, are called "commissioners," is also assigned to him, with whom he is bound to advise, and whose concurrence is necessary for certain of his actings. The commissioners, who are chosen by the creditors in the same way as the trustee, have commonly a personal knowledge of the kind of business carried on by the bankrupt, and are thus often able to give the trustee material assistance in dealing with the estate. The trustee has of course no fixed salary. In bankruptcies which are wound up by composition settlements the commissioners fix the remuneration to be paid to the trustee, subject to review by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff. In bankruptcies which are wound up by recovery and distribution of the assets, the trustee is entitled to a commission on the sum realised, the amount of commission being also fixed by the commissioners, subject to the same review. In the first case, the remuneration commonly allowed the trustee amounts, on an average, to about 2½ per cent. on the gross value of the assets; and in the second case, the average commission is 5 per cent. These, it will be seen, are much lower scales of remuneration than are allowed in England to the official assignees.

It is further remarkable that, although in England every bankruptcy is complicated with a double set of trustees, viz., the official and the creditors' assignees, these officers are relieved entirely from one of the most important functions devolved on the Scotch trustee. With us, the proof of the debts proceed, in the first instance, before the trustee alone. He acts as a sort of judicial arbiter in ascertaining the validity and amount of the claim of each creditor, who can neither vote in the sequestration nor draw a dividend if a ranking is refused by the trustee, and his judgment acquiesced in or confirmed on appeal. The proof is by affidavit, with relative vouchers, and the trustee has power to call for further productions, if not satisfied with the first. He can also advise in cases of difficulty with the law agent in the sequestration. An appeal lies from the trustee's deliverance to the Sheriff or the Court of Session, and finally to the House of Lords; but out of the many thousand debts which are annually adjudicated upon by trustees, there are not on an average eight or ten in a thousand in which his views are not acquiesced in, or which give rise to judicial inquiry. In this easy, cheap, and speedy mode of proving debts there is this additional advantage, that the trustee becomes at once familiarly acquainted with the character of the whole demands against the estate. In England, proof of debts is made entirely a judicial matter, and takes place before the commissioner at special sittings of his court. But in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the business is merely routine, and there is no dignus vindice nodus calling for the interposition of a judge and all the machinery of a court. The work itself may be as well done in England as in Scotland; but the mode of doing it in Scotland is simpler and less expensive, especially when we consider that in England an appeal lies from the Court of Bankruptcy to the Vice-Chancellor, from the Vice-Chancellor to the Lord Chancellor, and from the Lord Chancellor, in certain cases, to the House of Lords. Nevertheless, it is right to notice that it has sometimes been objected to the Scotch system that the trustee is in the position of an American judge deciding on the claims of those who helped him to his office or who voted against him, and who could by a majority dismiss him. If he reject a good claim, no great evil is done, because the claimant can at once appeal to the Sheriff and the stakes of the parties are equal, the loss or gain of the dividend. But when he admits a bad claim, the onus of appeal is thrown on "any of the creditors," few of whom ever think of examining the rankings, or looking after more than their own claim. Besides, the appellant in such a case runs the risk of contesting the trustee's deliverance at his own expense, and even if he succeeded will probably only gain a trifling augmentation of dividend. In point of fact, very few such appeals are taken, although it has been asserted that trustees who are put into office by the votes of banks and other large creditors sometimes admit claims which should be rejected. My own belief, however, is that instances of such malpractices are rare, and that trustees in general adjudicate on claims with the most perfect conscientiousness.

In the important matter of declaration of dividends, a similar difference of system prevails, the declaration in Scotland being made by the commissioners, and in England by the court. In Scotland, the trustee is required to make up accounts of the estate, exhibiting the amount recovered and outstanding, on the expiry of four, eight, eleven, and fourteen months from the date of sequestration, and periodically every three months thereafter, until the estate is finally recovered and divided. The commissioners must meet within fourteen days after each of these periods to audit the accounts, and to declare whether any, and if so, what part of the net produce of the estate, after making a reasonable deduction for future contingencies, shall be divided among the creditors; and whatever dividend is declared is payable within two months. There may thus be a first dividend in six months, a second in ten, a third in thirteen, a fourth in sixteen, and so on at the end of every three months till the estate is distributed. The trustee, having previously admitted, rejected, or modified the creditors' claims, and his judgments having been either acquiesced in or appealed against, is in a position, before the period assigned for the payment of each dividend, to make up a scheme of division of the sum which the commissioners have ordered to be divided. He pays the dividends to the creditors entitled to draw them, and lodges in bank the dividends corresponding to claims under appeal, or claims of contingent creditors. In certain cases, where funds are ready for division before the statutory periods arrive, powers are given for having the dividends accelerated, and in other cases judicial authority may be obtained for postponing or altering the periods for payment of dividends. In England there is no fixed period for the declaration or payment of dividends in any bankruptcy. At any time the court thinks fit, after the final examination of the bankrupt, a public sitting may be appointed to audit the assignees' accounts; and after this has been done, the court may, also at a public sitting, "direct such part of the net produce of the bankrupt's estate as it may think fit to be forthwith divided among such creditors as have proved debts under the bankruptcy, in proportion to their respective debts, and shall make an order in writing under the hand of the commissioner for dividend accordingly." It is the duty of the official assignee to pay the dividends forthwith, in conformity with this order. If the first dividend does not exhaust the estate, the court orders a second at any period within eighteen months of the adjudication; and the second dividend is final, unless further assets come afterwards into the hands of the assignees. One advantage of the Scotch system for declaring dividends is that there is a statutory certainty of time; but in other respects the English method may answer equally well, always subject to the observation that there is no necessity for that being done by a court which can be done as satisfactorily by the trustee for the creditors.

Passing from the bankrupt estate to the bankrupt himself, it will be found that considerable differences exist in the manner in which he is dealt with. He may, in both countries, contest the adjudication or sequestration, if applied for without his consent; but in England, if adjudication be awarded, the bankrupt, under penalty of being deemed guilty of felony, and liable to transportation for life, must surrender himself, within sixty days, by appearing in court and signing a memorandum of surrender. No such penal consequences follow the non-surrender of a bankrupt in Scotland; but if he contumaciously abstain from attending the diet fixed for his examination, a warrant to apprehend him for examination is granted on the application of the trustee. The English plan is perhaps preferable, it being clearly the duty of an insolvent whose estates have been judicially handed over to his creditors, to be at all times ready to give every information that may be required; and delay in doing so may lead to serious loss and inconvenience. Yet it not unfrequently happens in Scotland that a sequestrated bankrupt thinks it prudent to go out of the way for a while, and after the lapse of months, or it may be years, he returns and goes through the necessary steps to enable him to obtain a discharge. No such latitude, it is conceived, should be allowed.

In England, if a bankrupt duly surrenders, he is free from arrest or imprisonment till after his examination; and, if the court see fit, till after he obtains his certificate. The court has also the power, if the bankrupt is in prison for debt at the time of the passing of the adjudication, to order his immediate release, either absolutely, or on such conditions as are thought fit. In Scotland, the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff may, and commonly does, grant personal protection to the debtor at the time of awarding sequestration till the meeting of creditors for the election of trustee; and at that meeting, or at any subsequent meeting, the creditors may resolve that personal protection should be granted or continued for such time as they may fix, and on the trustee reporting the resolution to the Sheriff, he gives a deliverance confirming it. If the debtor be in prison, power is given to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff to liberate him after hearing the incarcerating creditor. As regards the allowance granted to the bankrupt for maintenance, the rules are much the same in both countries, with this explanation, that in England it is the court, as usual, that grants the allowance; in Scotland it is the creditors. The public examination of the bankrupt, and of members of his family, and others who can give information about his affairs, is conducted nearly in the same way in England and Scotland. It is only since 1856 that the examinations in Scotland have been in open court, and that the representatives of the press have been in the habit of attending them and reporting the procedure. This publicity, whilst it frequently fills up newspaper columns with matter of little general interest, operates, at the same time, as a wholesome check, and is calculated, on the whole, to do good.

The foregoing brief and imperfect comparison (many details being omitted) between the English and Scotch systems of bankruptcy, seems to force upon us certain conclusions:—First, the Scotch system is simpler; our Consolidated Act has only 185 sections; the intended Consolidation Act of the Attorney-General has 544 sections. Second, our system is better understood, and more approved of by the people. Third, it is greatly cheaper, imposing nothing like the same amount of burden, either on the national revenue, or on the assets of bankrupt estates. Fourth, it gives, beneficially, greater control to the creditors, leaving to their judgment various matters which in England are brought unnecessarily into court. Fifth, it does not sanction the divided responsibility and consequent complications attendant on the appointment of a double set of officers—an official and a creditors' assignee—to do what is better done by one. Sixth, it imposes duties on the trustee nominated by the creditors, for the discharge of which he is perfectly fitted, and the performance of which abrogates the necessity for much judicial machinery; and, lastly (what cannot be predicated of the English system), it accomplishes what it undertakes, for it judicially manages and distributes a debtor's estate better than it could be managed and distributed extra judicially. In Scotland, therefore, the Bankrupt Law, though still capable of improvement, has attained to a great degree of perfection; in England it is in a state which loudly calls for a large and sweeping reform.

BANKRUPT LAW AMENDMENT.

A meeting of the Mercantile Legislation Committee of the Social Science Association, consisting of representatives of Chambers of Commerce and Trade Protection Societies, was recently held in the Council Room, Moor-street, Birmingham. The chief object of the meeting was to consider the present position of the question of Bankrupt Law Amendment, and to resolve on the course which the committee should follow to obtain a recognition of their principles by the Legislature in the ensuing session of Parliament. The chair was taken at twelve o'clock by George W. Hastings, Esq. (of the Worcester Chamber of Commerce), and the representatives present from our own Chamber were Arthur Ryland, Esq. (Mayor of Birmingham), Mr. Sampson S. Lloyd, and Mr. Browett. Letters and communications were read from the Chambers of Commerce of Liverpool, Leeds, Bristol, Sheffield, Wolverhampton, and Coventry. The Chairman stated that Mr. Scholefield, M.P., Mr. Ryland, as secretary to the committee, and himself, had been for some time past in communication with the Attorney-General, as to his promised bill on the law of bankruptcy, but they had not received from Sir Richard Bethell any answer that the measure would effectually carry out those principles which the committee had on several occasions affirmed, and which were embodied in the bill introduced by Lord John Russell and Mr. Headlam in 1859. Under these circumstances it had been thought necessary to convene the committee to consider for themselves what course they should adopt. After some considerable discussion, the following resolution was moved by Mr. Ryland, seconded by Mr. Bissington, of Leeds, and carried:—

"That it is desirable that the Bankruptcy Amendment Bill introduced by Lord John Russell and Mr. Headlam, at the instance of the Chambers of Commerce and Trade Protection Societies, in 1859 (with such amendments in minor details as may be deemed necessary by a sub-committee to be appointed for the purpose), should be brought into the House of Commons early in next session; and that the members of Parliament who may have the conduct of the bill be requested to inform the Attorney-General that in taking this step the committee is actuated, not by any desire to embarrass the Government, but by the wish to place the views of the bodies whom it represents before Parliament, and thereby to aid in obtaining the best possible bill."

The Chairman was requested to communicate this resolution to all the Chambers of Commerce, and other similar bodies, in the kingdom; and a sub-committee was appointed to make any necessary verbal amendments in the bill before its introduction, and to place it in the hands of a competent member. Mr. Murray, M.P. for Newcastle-under-Lyme, Mr. Bazley, M.P. for Manchester, and our esteemed representative, Mr. Scholefield, were spoken of as likely to give their names to the measure.

The other subjects dilated were the Registration of Partnerships and Trade Marks. On the former it was resolved that inquiry into the whole question by a Parliamentary Committee was the first step that ought to be taken: and the following passage from a report of the committee to the Social Science Association at Glasgow was quoted with approval:—

"The establishment of a registration of partnerships on a wise principle, and without any cumbrous official machinery, would strengthen legitimate credit, while it would diminish false speculation; it would save many a bad debt, and reduce the number of failures; it would strike a blow at false pretence in trading, and therefore raise the standard of commercial morality. One of its incidental, but not least important effects would be to facilitate the recommendation of the Mercantile Law Commissioners, that a firm in England should be allowed to sue, and be sued, in its partnership name, instead of being compelled to recite in the pleadings the names of all the partners—thus adopting the rule of the Scotch law, which recognises a private partnership as a distinct person, separate from the copartners of which it is composed. It is obvious, and it was admitted by the Commissioners, that the suggested alteration should be accompanied by regulations enabling all who deal with a partnership to ascertain who the partners are, so that the adoption of this great improvement on our existing law must be dependent on the establishment of an efficient registration of partnerships."

On the subject of Trade Marks it was stated by Mr. Ryland that a bill had been prepared by the Chambers of Commerce of Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Sheffield, and that the Board of Trade, at the request of Mr. Spooner, M.P., had fixed to see a deputation on the subject on the 7th of February. It was therefore resolved that the committee should request the Board of Trade to receive a deputation from their own body at the same day and hour, so that the necessity for legislation might be pressed upon Government with as much influence as possible. It was also resolved that the question of trade marks should be recommended to the Council of the Social Science Association as a fit subject for discussion (on international grounds) by the foreign delegates who are expected to attend the next annual meeting of the Association.

After the transaction of some other business of less importance, the meeting broke up.—Birmingham Daily Post.

DEPOSITORY FOR WILLS OF LIVING PERSONS.

By a recent regulation, sanctioned by the judge of the Court of Probate, the wills of living persons may be received by the district registrars of the 40 country district registries of the Court, for the purpose of being deposited for safe custody in the principal registry, 6, Great Knight-riding-street, Doctors'-commons, which is the sole depository yet appointed for the lodgment of such wills, under the 91st section of the Court of Probate Act. The following instructions have just been issued on the subject:—

"The will or codicil to be deposited must be enclosed in a sealed envelope and delivered to one of the registrars of the Court, at the principal registry, or to a district registrar, either by the testator himself, or by some person specially authorised by him to deposit the same on his behalf. The will or codicil so deposited will not be delivered up to any person, but must remain in the registry until after the testator's death. In case the testator himself deposits his will or codicil, he will be required to sign his name in the presence of the registrar to an endorsement on the envelope in which the will or codicil is enclosed, to the following effect:—'This sealed packet contains the last will and testament, or codicil to the last will and testament, or last will and testament and codicil thereto, bearing date respectively (here the dates of all the papers enclosed are to be stated), of A. B., &c., whereof C. D., of &c., and E. F., of &c., are appointed executors, and the same are brought into the principal registry of her Majesty's Court of Probate, by me for safe custody, there to remain deposited until after my decease.' (The residences of the testator and of the executors are to be set forth in this endorsement, and also the date of signature.) In case the testator authorizes some other person to deposit his will or codicil for him, he will be required to subscribe his name, in the presence of an attesting witness, to an endorsement, on the envelope in which the will or codicil is enclosed to the following effect:—'This sealed packet contains the last will and testament, or codicil to the last will and testament, or last will and testament and codicil thereto, of me, A. B., of &c., whereof C. D., of &c., and E. F., of &c., are appointed executors; and I authorise G. H. to deposit the same for safe custody in the principal registry of her Majesty's Court of Probate, there to remain until after my decease. Signed A. B.; witness, K. L. (The residence of the testator and of the executors, and the date of signature, to be set forth in this endorsement.)'

The packet containing the will or codicil must be accompanied by an affidavit from the attesting witness, to the effect that the signature of the testator to the above endorsement, witnessed by the deponent, is in the proper handwriting of such testator, and was by him signed in the deponent's presence on the day mentioned in the endorsement, and that the signature "K. L." is in the proper handwriting of the deponent. An affidavit will also be required from the person authorised to deposit the packet, to the effect that the sealed packet produced for the purpose of being deposited for safe custody in the principal registry of her Majesty's Court of Probate, and on the back of which the deponent has signed his name, is at the time of making the affidavit precisely in the same state, plight, and condition as when received by the deponent from the hands of A. B., the testator, on a day to be mentioned as that on which he received it. The last-mentioned affidavit is to be sworn before the registrar, to whom the packet containing the will or codicil is delivered. The fees payable are—for depositing the will and receipt for same, £1 1s.; for drawing and entering minute of the registrar, 2s. 6d.; for filing each affidavit, 2s. 6d. Envelopes for wills, with the necessary forms, are to be had on application.

A correspondent of the Times, writing on this subject, says:—

"It is provided, inter alia, that one of the registrars of the court shall in all cases personally receive the document intended to be deposited either from the hands of the testator or from his accredited agent, in a sealed-up envelope.

"May I take the liberty of suggesting that the time of the registrar would be but little trespassed upon, and his duties in this respect very slightly increased, were he required on each occasion of a will being brought for deposit to examine in the presence of the party charged with its temporary custody the signature of the testator and the attestation clause of the instrument, and were he empowered to remit it for fresh execution when either of these appeared to be informal?"

"It is well known that a vast number of the questions arising upon the validity of wills owe their origin to the discovery of doubtful or imperfect execution of the instrument, that discovery, too, being made at a period when no fatal defect can be rectified; it therefore appears to me that an examination into the validity of the execution by an officer who from his legal status is perfectly qualified to make one during the life of the testator would be productive of great additional security to devised property, and would prevent a large amount of costly and usually very painful litigation."

GEO. H. PARKINSON.

CANADA EXTRADITION CASE.

We extract the following from a communication to the Times:—

"The extradition treaty and the statute of Canada both refer, as I understand, in their terms to 'persons' charged with murder or other crimes. Now, I conceive that the word 'persons' cannot be here construed as extending to slaves. It must be confined to the men, women, and children to whom the general rights and liabilities of sentient beings attach, and has no reference to those whose social condition is so peculiar as to deprive them of the rights which all others enjoy, and to subject them to liabilities from which all others are exempt.

"One of the most marked and hideous features of slavery as established in America I apprehend to be that the negro is merely property—in other words, that he is a chattel and not a 'person;' and, though there may be laws in that country so far protecting him as to make it penal to deprive him of life or member, this cannot properly be considered as investing him with civil rights or raising him above the character of civil impersonality, any more than in England is the case with cattle because protected by a statute which makes it penal to treat them with cruelty. Accordingly we shall find, I believe, that this idea of the slave's impersonality is always pursued in the phraseology of those American statutes in which it becomes necessary to mention him."

CURRENT TOPICS.

The Courts of Equity will sit again on Thursday next. Considerable progress was made during last term in disposing of the causes set down for hearing at the commencement of term. The Court of Appeal got through its entire list, the Lord Chancellor having generally sat by himself, and there being thus two courts of appeal nearly always sitting. It is not improbable that before the commencement of next sittings, the expected general Order relating to oral evidence in court will be published. We believe it has been for some time past undergoing the consideration and revision of the authorities.

The Middle Temple has restored the old custom of occasional public "Readings" by benchers, which had been discontinued since the year 1680. Last term Mr. R. J. Phillimore, the reader appointed by the benchers, read in the Middle Temple Hall a paper on "Minority and Majority in England and Abroad."

Mr. John Smale, of the Chancery bar, who has been long known to the profession by his valuable reports of the decisions in the courts of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce and the Vice Chancellor Stuart, has been appointed to the Attorney-Generalship of Hong Kong. The appointment will afford satisfaction to members of the Chancery bar, inasmuch as there has been amongst them of late a notion that, as a body, they have been improperly and unfairly excluded from colonial appointments. Unquestionably, the Common Law bar have been, during the last two or three years, appointed to a disproportionate number of colonial judgeships; and it has been whispered about that Sir Charles Wood, the present Secretary of State for India, has expressed his unwillingness to appoint any equity barrister to the Indian bench.

Mr. Turnbull has resigned his office at the Rolls. He was appointed about eighteen months ago by the Master of the Rolls as Calendarer of the Foreign State Papers in the Public Record Office. The appointment, however, gave rise to a very violent opposition on the part of the Protestant Alliance, and two or three similar bodies, upon the ground that Mr. Turnbull's religious opinions as a Roman Catholic unfitted him to discharge the duty of making a Calendar of State Papers, some of which affected questions of importance to the religious history of this country. The entire competency in other respects of Mr. Turnbull was admitted on all hands. But this objection was urged, although comparatively by a small number of persons, yet with so much vehemence, that Mr. Turnbull resolved upon resigning an office which required the confidence of the public, of which he had been deprived by the clamour that had been raised against him. In acknowledging a letter announcing his resignation, Sir John Romilly wrote a reply which has given great satisfaction, not only to the friends of Mr. Turnbull, who are very numerous, but to all friends of civil and religious liberty. It was as follows:—

Rolls, Jan. 29, 1861.

My dear Sir,—It is with much regret that I have read your letter, resigning your present employment. I feel, however, that I cannot press you to retain a situation which subjects you to so much persecution as that to which I have inadvertently exposed you.

My regret at your resignation is, however, mainly founded on the public loss, which will, I believe, be sustained by the discontinuance of your services; nor will it be easy to find a gentleman both willing to carry on the arduous task in which you have been engaged and also possessed of the peculiar knowledge and capacity required for that purpose.

I cannot conclude without expressing the high esteem I entertain for yourself personally, and the pain I feel that any society of English gentlemen, professedly founded on religious principles, should have been found to exist in this country who have considered it consistent with the charity on which those principles are based, to endeavour, by ex parte statements, and confidential canvassing, to remove from an employment for which he is peculiarly fitted a gentleman so honourable and trustworthy as I consider you to be.—I am, yours very sincerely,

W. B. Turnbull, Esq.

JOHN ROMILLY.

Mr. Turnbull was for many years a member of the Scottish, and he is now of the English, Bar; but he is mainly known as an accomplished black-letter scholar and archæologist.

TAXATION OF SUITORS.—No. IV.

HOW FAR OFFICERS OF THE LAW SHOULD RECEIVE FEES TO THEIR OWN USE? HOW FAR THERE IS AN ANNUAL ESTIMATE AND ASSESSMENT OF FEES TO MEET ANNUAL WANTS? HOW FAR THE FEES ARE PROPERLY COLLECTED AND ACCOUNTED FOR? AND WHAT WOULD BE THE STATESMANLIKE METHOD OF DOING THE WORK?

Hitherto we have been occupied in investigating the abstract rules which should govern the Legislature in providing for the maintenance of courts of justice. We now touch upon questions of fact, on which, to a great extent, we are without the means of knowledge, and which cannot be thoroughly inquired into without the assistance of the body of solicitors (particularly of those in the country), and probably only by a Government commission. Thoroughly to deal with these topics we want, at the outset, a list of all the law courts and offices of the kingdom—an enumeration, that is, of all the channels, down to the minutest rill, through which the streams of justice flow from the one great fountain-head, the Crown. Where to find such a list we know not. The Law List does not contain it. In the annual judicial statistics we have a return of about thirty borough, hundred, and local courts; some of them transacting business to a considerable amount. But many important tribunals are not mentioned there. One such, for instance, is the Court of Passage at Liverpool. This court is regulated by at least five Acts of Parliament. But then, unfortunately (and we should also, speaking as legislators, say improperly), these statutes (except 25 Geo. 3, c. 43) are treated as local and personal acts, and therefore are not printed in the public statute-book. We have hunted up these Acts, and find that the court is maintained by the Corporation of Liverpool, the officers paid by salary, and the fees received for the borough fund. Most of these local courts are maintained by fees taken to the officers' own use. In all cases where a salary is guaranteed to the judge, we think it will always be found charged (either directly, or in default of sufficient fees), on some local, never on the consolidated fund.

The Court of the Stannaries is a good instance. This court is now regulated by the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 106. The salaries of the vice-warden, registrar, &c., are paid half out of the revenues of the duchy, and the other half out of the fees and out of a tax of a farthing in the pound on all minerals except tin raised in the district. The fees appear to be collected in money. The officers account to the registrar; the registrar to the vice-warden; and the vice-warden to the auditor of the duchy. The Duchy Court of Lancaster should also be particularly mentioned. It is regulated by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 43. The fees are regulated by the Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor; and are collected in money. The registrar accounts once a-year to the Vice-Chancellor, and his fees are paid to a fee-fund. The district registrars we believe retain their fees to their own use. The salary of the Vice-Chancellor we assume is paid out of the duchy funds. The fees accounted for in 1839 appear to be about £4,000.

Of the smaller tribunals we know nothing. There are also many offices established for legal purposes not immediately connected with courts, such as the Middlesex and York register offices, the position of which we have not investigated.

A cursory investigation of the arrangements of the local courts would require a chapter to itself. Here a novelty for the financial management of courts has been introduced in the establishment of treasurers; a scheme we believe to be a bad one. Indeed, we think, throughout the local court system, the influence of place making and political party serving motives may be traced. The whole structure wants a careful and impartial survey. The treasurers should be abolished, and fees should be collected in these, as in all other courts, by special stamps. The banking department of these and all other courts we propose to deal with in a future article. We understand a committee or commission of county court judges has lately been considering this subject. With every respect for those learned judges, we think that they were not the right persons for the task; we should wish rather to see financiers than lawyers engaged on it. And we feel convinced that one system of taxation and banking under one central authority should be applied to all the courts of the kingdom. The fusion of legal jurisdiction is quite another question. But we cannot doubt that one Legal revenue board, and, what would follow as a matter of course, one system, should exist for the whole kingdom.

With reference to the superior courts of law and equity, and to the Admiralty and Probate Courts, full details of the mode of collecting the taxes will be found in Mr. Lake's evidence before the recent commission on Concentration of Courts (p. 59). All the taxes (or fees, if the false name is still to be used), except those of the common law courts are collected by fee stamps. What justification can be urged for the continuance in the Common Law Courts of the vicious and condemned system of collecting the tax through officers acting as bailiffs for the consolidated fund, it passes us to conceive. And yet the common law establishment was remodelled in 1852 (stat. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 73), whereas the sentence of denunciation was pronounced by the House of Commons Fees Committee, in their reports of 1848 and 1849. The fee stamp system first tried in Ireland (Stat. 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 112), and introduced by Lord St. Leonards for the English Chancery Court, in 1852 (stat. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87) has been found so simple and perfect, that it is most difficult to refrain from attributing sinister motives to the re-enactment of the money system for the common law establishment. We believe that, taking all the common law courts together, there are above 100 persons who receive cash as tax collectors for the Treasury, and that there is no kind of audit on behalf of the public. As to many of the fees, from their nature, there could be no efficient audit; as every practitioner will know. In Chancery, in the old money taking times, an affidavit was made of the amount of fees received. In common law no such thing is required. The Treasury is to open its mouth and shut its eyes, and take what the century of officers will send it. All the obvious evils pointed out by the Fees Committees have been here perpetuated. The time of 100 officers is wasted in account keeping—their honesty tampered with—a cloud of suspicion is inevitably thrown round them. Small as the check is, we have heard that more than one subordinate has absconded; that no security is given, and that their deficiencies have never been made good. The case of Swabey in another court we need not refer to; nor to the defaulters among official assignees.

The second report of the Fees Committee (8th May 1848) contains these resolutions:—

9. That in taking of fees the following things are to be provided for:—

1. That no more is levied than is absolutely required for the purpose for which fees are imposed.
2. That all fees imposed shall be actually levied.
3. That the whole amount levied is applied for the purposes for which the fees are levied.

10. To promote the first object it is important to consolidate offices as much as possible, and to discontinue useless offices and forms of proceeding.

11. To promote the 2nd object, it is essential to provide a test of payment, so that no person should be able to escape the payment of the fees imposed.

12. To promote the 3rd object, it is essential to provide a check, whereby the total amount levied may be paid into the fee fund.

13. To promote all three objects, it is essential that fees should be consolidated, so as to be made as few in number as possible.

14. That the fees should be levied with as little inconvenience to the suitor as possible.

These most wise resolutions are contemptuously set at naught in the present system of assessing and collecting the tax on common law suitors. Principles deliberately adopted by the Legislature, whatever they may be, should, as far as possible, be applied to every court of justice and law office, great or small. The remuneration of officers by fees has, since 1833, been emphatically condemned. It should no longer be allowed anywhere; and the authorities concerned in the preparation of all such Acts as, for instance, those governing the duchy court, in our opinion, are open to censure for contravening a rule so distinctly pronounced by the Legislature as that of 1833. Again, no more fees, say the committee, should be annually levied than are required. But see with what triumphant defiance the Court of Chancery treats this rule. Not only since 1833 have £83,557 more fees been assessed than expended, but this excess has been levied while the Court has had in hand an accumulation of surplus fees which it has invested in £201,000 stock. Not only this, but the Court has also had in hand accumulated banking profits, to the benefit of which, on all sides it is admitted, the suitors are entitled, and (being the fund now proposed to be used for building the new courts) to the extravagant amount of a million and a quarter. A tax on suitors is, so far as it goes, a denial of justice. A tax on suitors is also a tax paid for liberty to employ the legal profession to obtain the suitor's rights. Is it not discreditable in the highest degree that such over taxation as this should have occurred? We know, well, it could only have been perpetrated in ignorance or thoughtlessness, or for want of some functionary whose duty it was to prevent the imposition of burthens so gratuitous and grievous. But that our management of legal taxation is ignorant is all we are contending for. We object to the continuance of such a state of anarchy. The taxation of suitors is really the affair of State financiers, and not a judicial one. For our clients, the over-burthened suitors, we must insist on an annual estimate of needs, an annual assessment, and a House of Commons ministerial responsibility.

The mere fact that there exists in the Court of Chancery a fund of above a million and a quarter, (a sort of foundling and filius nullius—the fund B. of the concentration commission), glad as we are to have the money for new courts, is all sufficient to overwhelm the present judicial financial system (or no-system) with disgrace and confusion. This fund was also gathered together, doubtless, in ignorance. If it had been got together on purpose, it would have been so much plunder; and the Court, in the eyes of a financial judge, would have been found red-handed.

The financial and banking mismanagement of the great funds in the hands of this Court, were considered by us at length some months since. As bearing on the question of the taxation of the suitor, we may remark that, had this fund B., which in 1842 (when the Six Clerks Office was abolished) amounted to £910,000 Stock, been then applied to the purchase of terminable annuities to defray the immense compensations then awarded, it would have been unnecessary to tax the suitors to defray those compensations, which in 1842 were £46,509 a-year. Even if it could have been thought wrong to sink any of the capital of this fund in the purchase of terminable annuities, we have next to point out that had the surplus interest of this fund (which, from 1842 to 1852 averaged £30,000 a-year), been at once applied in aid of the fee fund, instead of deferring that very proper step till 1852—the sum of £30,000 a-year would have been annually saved to the three generations of over taxed suitors, who formed the population of the Court of Chancery during those ten years. By the monstrous system of excessive taxation of which we are complaining, this fund was kept under accumulation till 1852, when it reached its present amount of £1,291,629 Stock, and its income of £40,000 a-year was then all in one swoop applied to the reduction of future fees.

A glance across the Channel to Ireland is often useful. While the suitors in the English chancery have been taxed to an amount greatly exceeding the needs of the court, in Ireland, as we might guess, the consolidated fund has been unduly paying them. By the 4 Geo. 4, c. 61. ss. 1 & 2, the Irish Lord Chancellor might have rightly adjusted the tax there to the needs. But from the Government finance accounts we see that the consolidated fund had in 1859 to provide £32,000 to meet the deficiency arising from the insufficient taxation of the chancery suitors. We suppose these calls in aid led the Treasury to appoint, as we see they did, the late Mr. Wilmot Seton and two officers of the Irish Court, commissioners to investigate the matter. This report was printed in 1859, and laid before Parliament. The commissioners recommended (p. 5) as follows:—

“We are of opinion that payment of fees in money should be discontinued in this, as well as in every other department of the court, and that a moderate stamp duty should be substituted.”

These commissioners were evidently altogether unaware of the House of Commons' reports upon fees, and in particular, they do not seem to have perceived the importance of the questions we have discussed, as to the proper incidence of taxation. Neither do they seem to have thought of looking to the finance arrangement of the court as the most legitimate mode of raising a revenue towards its support. These shortcomings have arisen from the piecemeal system hitherto pursued in dealing with legal taxation and finance, under which every court has been considered and regulated separately, or rather, has been expected to consider and regulate and purge itself. Had there been any office of law revenue and finance connected with the Treasury, such shortcomings could not have happened; and this Irish episode of our story shows that these matters can only be dealt with rightly in the wholesale, and must fail when dealt with separately, and in the retail. In the Irish common law courts, all fees are now collected by stamps, under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 114.

The conclusions we have arrived at on the subjects mentioned at the head of this article, are already denoted. They are that the collection of all fees for every court and office, should be by a specially issued stamp only. That money should on no pretence ever pass from suitor or solicitor to the officers of court; that the gross income should be received intact; and that the officer's salaries should always be paid to him, as to all the courts belonging to the State, by a Law tax department of the Treasury. That there should be an annual review, and budget, and re-imposition, and re-assessment of law taxes, so that such injustice as that in Chancery of the ten years 1842 to 1852 should be prevented; and so that at no time too much tax should be imposed on any suitor. That the tax should as much as possible be an ad valorem tax, and not a poll tax, and that all this should be so arranged as to involve some annual vote by Parliament, and thus insure full parliamentary responsibility for a most important public duty, which now so far as we can see is left to do itself as it best may. The whole results should appear in the annual issue of judicial statistics.

PROCEEDINGS IN CHANCERY “CHAMBERS.”

We insert this week a copy of the return referred to under this head in a former article (ante, p. 195). Some further suggestions as to the jurisdiction by summons at chambers may still be offered. Should any extension of such jurisdiction be determined on, there would be no difficulty whatever in carrying it out; it not being necessary since the passing of the Act of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 134, to apply to the Legislature for the purpose of carrying into effect any alterations under the statutory jurisdiction by which the Court of Chancery is empowered to make orders in a summary way. The Lord Chancellor, under sect. 16 of that Act, has power by general order to declare what applications shall be made at chambers.

When the jurisdiction at chambers was introduced in cases under the statute 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 32 (for payment into court of legacies), and the Trustee Relief Act (where the fund was not more than £300) it was thought that, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act also in cases where the amount of the fund was not more than £300, applications by summons might be entertained at chambers, although that mode of proceeding under the last mentioned Act is not expressly authorised by the consolidated orders of the Court defining the jurisdiction at chambers; see order 35, rule 1; but in the case of Clarke's devisees, 6 W. R., p. 812, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley decided that the application must be made by petition. Now, the expense of a petition is not inconsiderable, and ought to be saved when possible; and is there any reason why these applications should not be made at chambers? Indeed, we think that the limit as to amount should be much extended if any limit at all should be retained. The smallest amount of costs of a petition of the very simplest character is £10; and half the expense or even more might be saved by an application at chambers.

The “Trustee Act, 1850,” (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 38), gave liberty to carry into the master's office a statement of facts, and to verify it, and the master was to certify as to the right to a vesting order; and by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 36, all powers given to the masters were transferred to the judge in chambers; but as the Court now makes orders under this Act without a reference to chambers, on proper evidence of the facts being given, this provision is useless. We think that, as suggested in our former article, in small cases at any rate, an original summons should be allowed for a vesting order of real estate, and also of choses in action, and the other matters embraced by this Act.

As regards proceedings under the Trustee Relief Act, if a summons be allowed, it would be an original summons, there being no matter created by the affidavit on which the money is paid in to support any other procedure. In the case of a party becoming absolutely entitled to a fund, the expense of a petition, and making out his title thereto, would in most cases,

We think that a mistake must have been made in 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 14, in giving liberty to apply by original summons for an order to advertise for creditors under Sir George Turner's Act. A motion or petition of course, which the Act also authorises, is the cheaper mode by more than half, as will be seen by the following particulars of the costs (taken on the higher scale) as to each method of proceeding, viz. :—

The subsequent costs are the same in each case. The expense of a petition of course is still less than that of a motion of course. The costs are as follows:—

The subsequent provisions in the 14th section are, however, most valuable, viz. the power given to executors or administrators to apply by summons to stay proceedings at law against them, which in many cases will be a great saving of expense, particularly as the summons would only be the common summons in a pending matter; and also the power given to the judge on application of the executor or administrator, to direct that particulars only of any claims shall be certified by the chief clerk without adjudication, thus getting rid of the costs of proof which, in the majority of cases of this sort, is unnecessary, as all the executor requires to establish by the proceeding is, that he has paid all the creditors, and that there can be no future claim upon him. There must be a special form of advertisement to give effect to the last-mentioned provision of the Act; and a general order will be required to authorize this. The 37th rule under the 35th of the Consolidated Orders of the Court, directs that the advertisement for creditors or other claimants, shall be in a form similar to the form in schedule L., with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require; and that the creditor or claimant must come in and prove his claim. The proof cannot be dispensed with except by a form of advertisement issued under a general order of the Court. It is suggested that such form should be in the alternative, so as to allow the executor or administrator the option of advertising for particulars only of all claims, or of those of limited amount (say under £5), or for creditors to come in and prove in the usual way. In the two former cases, the executor or admini-

The judges have the same power and jurisdiction conferred on them by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, with respect to chamber business, as when sitting in open court (see s. 13), and they have also full power to direct by general order what business shall be disposed of by them in chambers (see s. 26). We hope, therefore, to see many of the improvements we have suggested carried into effect, and increased facilities thus given for the dispatch of the business of the Court at much less expense to the suitor.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER.

Cause was now shown against the rule. It appeared that Mr. Hayward had been appointed on the 5th of August, 1851, but in 1860 a charge had been made against him that, being a trustee, he had sold out some money in the funds, and applied a considerable portion to his own private use. The fraud was committed before the passing of the Fraudulent Trustee Act, and was disclosed in some Chancery proceedings, and upon the proof of the fraud the Master of the Rolls dissolved the partnership which Mr. Hayward was then carrying on with another gentleman as an attorney. The council of Rochester also took the matter up and appointed a committee, and required Mr. Hayward to attend before them, but he refused to attend, as he considered the council had no power in the matter. The council then removed him from his office of clerk of the peace of the city; but it was now contended that the right of removal was not in the council, but in the recorder. The recorder also had taken the same view of the case, for he had refused to allow the gentleman whom the council had appointed to act in Mr. Hayward's place. The question, therefore, was whether the power of removal was in the council cil or in the recorder. It appeared that by the statute of the 1st of William and Mary, sec. 1, cap. 21, the clerk of the peace for the county was appointed by the custos rotulorum, and he held his office so long as he well demeaned himself, but the power of removing him in case he should misdeemean himself was, by the 6th section of the Municipal Corporation Act (5th & 6th William 4., cap. 76) given to the justices in quarter sessions. The justices in quarter sessions were to hold a judicial inquiry, and had power either to suspend or discharge the clerk of the peace, in which case the custos rotulorum had power to appoint another. By the 101st section of the Municipal Corporations Act, on the petition of the town-council, the Crown could grant a right of holding a separate quarter sessions to a borough, and appoint a recorder; and the town-council had power to appoint a clerk of the peace for the borough, who was to hold his office during good behaviour. The 105th section then defined the jurisdiction of the recorder, who was to hold courts of quarter sessions for the borough, to be a court of record, and to have cognizance of all crimes and offences, "and all matters whatsoever cognizable by any court of quarter sessions." The last clause, it was contended, was large enough to convey to the recorder the same jurisdiction, as to the removal of the clerk of the peace for the borough, as was exercised by the county sessions in the case of the clerk of the peace of the county.

Mr. Justice CROMPTON said there was some doubt about the matter, but the authorities in this court were all in favour of the defendant. The court could not say the question ought not to be argued.

The counsel who appeared in support of the rule, were not called upon, and the rule was made absolute in order that the argument might take place on the return to the writ.

Rule absolute.

Jan. 29.—Martin v. Hiron.—A rule was moved for in this case calling upon the Sheriff of Middlesex to show cause why he should not pay the defendant the sum of 10s., and also calling upon two of his assistants, named Mott and Mayhew, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against them for extortion.

It appeared that the defendant had been taken on a ca. sa. by two assistants of the Sheriff of Middlesex, and one of them, named Mott, demanded of him the sum of 5s., which he said was his regular fee. The defendant said he never heard of such a thing as to make a man pay for being taken into custody. Mott said the money went to the office for searching, and that if he didn't pay it, it would cost him a guinea, or more, when he got to prison. The defendant not having any money, was taken to Southampton-street, where he borrowed it, and paid the 5s. The other man, Mayhew, then demanded 5s. as his caption fee, in addition to the cab fare, and said that he could take the coat from the defendant's back or the watch from his pocket if he did not pay it. Under these threats the defendant was induced to part with his money. The statement of the defendant was corroborated by the affidavits of other persons. There was authority for the present application in the case of Blake v. Newborn, (17 L. J. Q. B. 216), where it was held that if a sheriff's officer is guilty of extortion the party complaining may call upon the sheriff to show cause why he should not refund the excess, and upon the officer to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him under the same rule.

The Court granted a rule to show cause.

(Before the JUDGE ORDINARY.)

Jan. 28.—Boynton v. Boynton.—The petitioner in this case, Mrs. Boynton, had obtained a verdict that her husband, the respondent, had been guilty of adultery and cruelty, and the Court had thereupon decreed a dissolution of the marriage. A petition had since been presented for an order respecting the settlement of the property, and another for the custody of the child. Counsel for Mr. Boynton suggested that it would be expedient to postpone the hearing of the petition as to the settlement, until the other petition as to the custody of the child was ready for hearing. The petitioner's counsel said that if the hearing were postponed the Court might make an interim order as to the property. Before the marriage the wife had property which produced an income of £576 a-year. By a post-nuptial settlement two-thirds of the sum was settled to the separate use of the respondent, and one-third was settled upon Captain Boynton for life. Upon the death of either the survivor was to have the whole for life. If, therefore, the lady died before an order was made, Captain Boynton would take the whole for life. The trustees of the fund had, since the suit was instituted, transferred it to the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—The Court of Chancery has much greater facilities than I have for dealing with questions of this kind. However, as the jurisdiction is given to me I must exercise it. If the Legislature find out that it is badly executed they must transfer it. His lordship asked what the petitioner had called herself since the decree, and upon being informed that it was not known what name she ought to take, said there was a difficulty about her resuming her maiden name; for if a lady called "Miss" were to be seen walking about with a son it would be rather awkward.

The case was ultimately ordered to stand over until the petition as to the custody of the child was ready for hearing.

(Before Sir C. CRESSWELL.)

Jan. 30.—In the goods of Elizabeth Freeman, deceased.—In this case a motion was made for probate of the will of Elizabeth Freeman. It appeared that after her death the will was handed to the attorney who had prepared it. When he read it over he discovered an interlineation, and knowing that it was not there at the time when the will was executed, and that it would be inoperative, he incautiously erased it. He had made an affidavit of these facts.

Sir C. CRESSWELL.—Does he state how long he has been a member of the profession? I should presume either that he was a perfect novice or that he was superannuated, otherwise he would never have taken such a liberty with a will. You may take the grant.

The undermentioned gentlemen were called to the Bar on Saturday, the 26th instant:—

Lincoln's inn.—Deane Parker Pennethorne, Esq., B.A., Cambridge (Certificate of Honour, first class); Percy Simpson, Esq., M.A., Cambridge; Arthur Giles Puller, Esq., M.A., Cambridge; Joseph Wm. EQUITY.

PRACTICE—ANSWER OF A COMPANY—EVIDENCE.

Wadeer v. The East India Company, M. R. 9 W. R. 251.

One result of the numerous changes which have been made of late years in the practice of the Court of Chancery has been to alter very much the object and use, and, therefore, the general character of Answers. Under the old practice, wherever a defendant could not plead, demur, or disclaim, he was compelled to answer, and in such cases, the issues involved were almost necessarily of pure fact; the answer was intended, however, not only to oblige the defendant to disclose the general nature of his defence, but also to obtain from him a discovery, so as to enable the plaintiff to obtain as far as possible complete justice. The plaintiff was entitled, not merely to rely upon the defence set up in the answer, as being that against which he was to direct his evidence in the suit, but he was also entitled to treat statements of facts in the answer as evidence against the defendant; whilst a defendant or co-defendant was not entitled to use an answer as evidence for the defence. The Chancery Amendment Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 86), introduced a great change into the practice of the Court in respect of answers; and the Orders about to be issued relating to oral evidence no doubt will alter still more the character of answers, so as to reduce them very much to mere instruments of pleading. The rule of law which at present enables the examination and cross-examination of parties to suits has gone very far to curtail the utility of discovery by the process of the Court of Chancery, so that it is becoming every day less used for that purpose. The use to plaintiffs, therefore, of answers, as supplying evidence is also becoming less; and the tendency of modern practice is, certainly, very much to reduce them to the mere use of a pleading. The contrary may, no doubt, appear to be the case, from the fact that the Act of 1852, while it abolishes the old rule, which always required an answer upon oath from every defendant (except those labouring under disability), and, on the other hand, allowed the defendant voluntarily to put in an answer, even when not required, makes the answer evidence not only for the plaintiff, but also, upon notice being given, for the defendant, and even as between co-defendants, [on this point the present practice of the court is laid down in detail in Wright v. Edwards, 7 W. R. 193]. The Act enables a defendant to add to his answer to the plaintiff's interrogatories any statement in support of his own case that he thinks fit. It may, therefore, appear that the modern practice is very much to increase the use of answers for the purpose of evidence; and in many cases, no doubt, it is. But generally, even in them, this circumstance is accidental, and arises rather from a convenient and collateral use of answers than from their intrinsic character. Even in the case of a voluntary answer the object of the defendant is not prematurely to disclose his evidence, but to place a statement of facts in the nature of a pleading upon the record. The same remark applies to the case of a compulsory answer, so far as the defendant has added thereto a voluntary statement. The first and sole object generally of answers so far as they are voluntary regards the pleading in a suit. The Chancery Amendment Act of 1852, for the sake of saving expence, allows that all answers on oath, when they have served their purpose of pleading, may, so far as they contain statements of fact, be used as evidence in the cause. As soon, however, as the new general Order on evidence comes into force defendants will probably reserve much of the information which they are in the habit of volunteering in their answers until they are orally examined before the Court; except so far as it may be desirable to have it appear upon the record that the plaintiff had the information at the earliest possible stage of the cause.

Wadeer v. The East India Company affords an illustration of the distinction between an answer when regarded as a pleading and when regarded as evidence. On the hearing of this cause upon motion for a decree, Sir John Romilly, M.R., refused to allow the answer under seal of a company, to be read as evidence on its behalf, upon the ground that it was not sworn: his Honour, however, allowed it to be read by the company as a matter of pleading, and he would probably even as evidence against the company.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—PRIORITY OF CHARGES.

Cooke v. Wilton, 9 M. R. 220.

In this case it appeared that a lady prior to the 29th June, 1858, had mortgaged property by deposit of title deeds. On the 29th of June, 1858, a judgment was registered against her. Two days afterwards the plaintiffs, without notice, as they alleged, of the judgment, paid off the equitable mortgagees and took the securities. Subsequently, a legal mortgage was executed to the plaintiffs. It was held that the legal estate of the plaintiffs, thus acquired, had reference back in point of date to the equitable mortgages; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to use the legal estate so as to cover all advances to the mortgagor subsequent to the date of the deposits, on the same securities, made by them bonâ fide, and without notice of other charges. As the evidence of the plaintiffs having had notice of the judgment appeared to the Court to be defective, it followed that the judgment creditor was postponed.

SOLICITORS' ACT—COSTS IN LUNACY.

Re Cumming. Ex parte Turner, L.J., 9 W. R. 213.

A case of the highest importance to solicitors of the Court, involving a question of the operation of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act of last session, was decided by the Lords Justices on the 17th of November last. The working of this measure is necessarily attended with some anomalies. Amongst others, the provision with respect to costs in lunacy is a very singular one. It entirely changes the rights of the parties at the time of the passing of the Act, and gives a preference to the solicitor over the other creditors of the testator. It is impossible, nevertheless, that the relief which was intended to be afforded by the Legislature could have been otherwise bestowed; and the urgency of the remedies required is proved by the increasing number of applications to the courts under the 28th & 29th clauses.

In the case before us, the applicant, a solicitor petitioning under the 29th section of the Act, was held to be excluded from the benefit of its provisions by the operation of the limitation clause (sec. 29), in matters relating to lunacy. The former clause (sec. 28), which gives to the courts the power of making solicitors' costs a charge upon recovered property, enacts that no order shall be made in any case where the right to recover is barred by any statute of limitations; but the 29th section expressly fixes a period. The proviso is, "That it shall not be lawful for the court or judge to make any such order, but within six years next after the right to recover such costs, charges, and expenses shall have accrued." The question here was, when did the right to recover accrue? It was argued, with great force, that the period from which the right accrued could only be the completion of the taxation; but Lord Justice Knight Bruce considered that the six years must be computed from the date of the death of the lunatic. Lord Justice Turner said he should not express any opinion on that subject; but of this he was clear—that it should have accrued at the period when the court declared the costs, charges, and expenses to have been properly incurred. He would not say the right did not accrue upon the death of the lunatic; but he was satisfied that, at latest, it accrued at the date of the order. There was an undoubted right to recover the costs the moment it was ascertained that they were properly incurred on behalf of the lunatic's estate. The strongest argument for supposing time to run from the death of the lunatic is to be found in the language of the 29th section. In the present case, it turned out that, according to either mode of computation, the solicitor's claim was barred; but it happened that the solicitor was also a mortgagee of a fund in court as a security for his costs. The mortgage-deed recited that the two married daughters of the lunatic were entitled, as tenants in common in remainder expectant on their mother's death in the fund; and their husbands, by the same deed, purported to convey to the solicitor the freehold property to which they were or should be thereafter entitled in right of their wives; and also assigned to him the fund. A receiver having been appointed, and considerable sums having been paid into court, it was held that the effect of the deed was to give Mr. Turner a security upon the interest of one of the husbands, in right of his wife, in property of which the lunatic was tenant in fee or tenant in tail—she never having barred the estate tail—and that he was entitled to deduct the costs from the rents accrued since the lunatic's death. It was argued that this was, in fact, a claim by a mortgagee for past rents; but the L. J. Turner said he considered them rather to be outstanding rents which had never got home to the mortgagor, and that the mortgagee was entitled to recover in respect of them.

COMMON LAW.

COUNTY COURTS—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURTS—9 & 10 VICT. c. 95, s. 128.

Adams v. The Great Western Railway Co., 9 W. R., Exch., 254.
